I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for allcading the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing I thinke, in euery estate some sufficient witness) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeede from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Friar, comming to visit him in his Popedom, as hauing long before in his meaner estate, bene his familiar friend. This poore Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old liberty of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning politician, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, all the subtiltie (said he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the Conclauce, and your vnappreciable thereto, the more I needes must wonder. So Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued, the Pope said true. For the wildest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we list vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

Vv

Qu

*Qui terram inermem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & vrbes, regnag, tristia
Diuosq, mortalesq, turmas, Imperio regi vnus equo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the winde-swolne streames,
The ciuill Cities, and the th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heauen, and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust command:

Then shall we finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertainty nor change; he foreseeeth all things, and all things dispose to his owne honour; He neither deceiveth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and head-long passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happiness, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yielding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoever; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skinn of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euer more.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule: The feare of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captiuitie: we may well beleue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, bene the lesse true, though they might haue beene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had bene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not haue done iniurie to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleue that any man of iudgement will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faime, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vie when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historian.

When Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any foreine enemy, nor domesticall aduersarie to disturber her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the yong Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had bene very vnfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacitie required to haue bene indued with the stomacke and qualities meete for a King. All this Ichoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe ouer all the Countrey, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore he associated vnto himselfe five of the Captaines, in whose fidelity he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Couenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succcede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associates of Ichoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty and seruiceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noyse, made vp such a number, as would be able to deale with the Queenes ordinary Guard, and that was enough, for if the Tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were bestowed in the vter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had stor'd enough; King Dauid had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed to defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high designe was to be put in execution; Ichoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vsing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word, which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of ineuitable mischief.

All Ierusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common ioy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noyse of folkes in the streetes, making towards the Temple, with much vnusuall passion in their looks, did presently conceiue, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoeuer it were, the meane to vie her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that she thought it some especiall solemnity vsed in the Diuine seruice, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption.

Many things argue that she little thought vpon her owne Tragedie, although Iosephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, She came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, she rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, she entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had she truly knowne how things went, she would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like to a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had bene meere madness in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if she perceived that neither her authority, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a childe of seauen yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not thinke that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had she vsed the most likely means to disappoint it: yet we neede not so cut her throat with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more easie success, through her indiscretion, than other wife could haue bene expected; so that at his appointment, she was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no blood, saue her owne, was shed in that quarrell, her small traine that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Iezabel.

MOST like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israélite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, she her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing tried such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murtheresse. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them suruising her husband about eight yeeres, did spend their time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vsing tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty minde, the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treason, receiued sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses, Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as hauing not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The seruice of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone; and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who succeeded them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazeael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to haue bene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; she had sons liuing after she was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it, For if the children of Athalia had bene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as neerely, and bene registered, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue saued these vngracious Imps, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that euery man should die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had bene professors and aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoyle of it; likely it is, that they should not haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had bene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps) following Hazeael in his warres against Iehu absent from Ierusalem; whereby Iehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of *Ioa*s and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

§. I.

Of *Ioa*s his doings, whilst Iehoiada the Priest liued.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietnesse; wherein *Ioa*s a childe of seauen yeeres old or there-about; began his reigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, hee liued vnder the protection of that honourable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preferred the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wiues, and began to Sonne and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almost worn out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needefull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrans; and requisite it was that he should vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not onely the Leuites were more slacke than he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gaue so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and siluer, and with all other Vntensils. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had bene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

§ II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of Ioas.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirtie yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could haue spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserued, hauing preferred the race of them, and reformed the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselves, and all their issue. Yet his honorable Funerall seemes to haue beene giuen to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of Dauid. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue beene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby beene discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda began to flatter their King, he soone forgot, not onely the benefits, receiued by this worthie man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea and God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, where with Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in fiftene or sixtene yeeres; that thirty yeeres, or thereabout, of the reigne of Ioas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himselfe, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King in deede, that he regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hercoy it appears, that his former zeale was onely counterfeited, wherein like an Actor vpon the stage, he had struuen to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeede religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Iuda in the dayes of Ioas.

BVt God, from whom he was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistines, addrest himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreame misery, to the fury of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay betweene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe; as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countreies usually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Ioas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Iehu his posteritie, who, like a bloody Traytor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subiect. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsoever it were, we finde it plainly, that Ioas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie seuenth yeere of Ioas, which was the fiftenth of Iehoahaz, hee made this purchase; but in the same or very next yeere hee died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly proue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the later, Ioas tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seeme to haue then beene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue bene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Iuda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Ioas (in vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former inuasion, I cannot perceiue that God forooke him, till hee had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Ioas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was hee more vniust in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iosias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God therein, which are ioyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoiada; soone after whose death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the fixe, or thirtie seuenth yeere of this Ioas his reigne, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater.

And indeed we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwaies tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen & strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that hee dealt with Ioas. For this vnhappie man did not onely continue an obdurate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had strouen to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should censure to imitate.

§. IIII.

How Zacharia was murdered by Ioas.

BVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Iehoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloued in his lifetime, and reuerenced, that if Ioas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought hee in common honesty, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person : On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnraccountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should haue placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured loue of Iosias, yea though he had bene otherwise a man of very small make, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appears that brings it. But this King Iosias, hauing already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heyre of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heyre, come let vs kill him that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great soeuer that mans deserting were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised vpon Naboth, or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neither reade, nor can coniecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique iudgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, insisted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commaundement, by which hee suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath bene already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

§. V.

How Iosias was shamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

His odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose bosome he had bene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed, to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested in all ages, so had it the well-described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heavily vpon the head of that vngodfull monster. It was the last yeere of his reigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when hee thought himselfe beginning to liue how he list without controulement. When that yeere was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrey, rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a small companie of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Iosias naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my iudgement proofe sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he might haue leaued (as his sonne after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when hee might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Routers, hee tooke a verie great Armie, so that wife men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrey, and expose himselfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth so stronglie appointed, against so weake enemies. Thus might wife men thinke, and laugh at him in secret; considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not onely at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Iosias met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoeuer means it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Army of Juda receiued a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebel to the King of Kings. As for Iosias himselfe (as Abulenfis and others expound the storie) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ranfome.

And surely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this coniecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon Iosias ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-faouoredly. Now at that time Iosias the sonne of Iehoiashaz reigned ouer Israel, and Benhadad the sonne of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrey; the other inferiour euery way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as afterward followed, might haue giuen to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of Warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good successe herof, already related, and the (perhaps as unexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following Warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakenesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Juda, after more then fortie yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so bene trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand Foot-men were left; preuailed against his Sonne, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples heereof are euerie where found, and therefore I will not insist vpon this; though indeed wee should not, if wee be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble actes performed by our fore-father vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they list, & saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Countrey, they departed out of Juda laden with spoyle, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammonitisse, and of a Moabitisse, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue bene bond-men. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) he should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tels vs plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Iehoiada, this befell him. And the same appears to haue bene vsed as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazias, the sonne and successor of Iosias, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchers of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserued death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Iosias: of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

Here liued with Iosias, Mezaces and Diognetus in Athens; Eudemus and Aristomides in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylaius, and after him Syluius Alladius, were Kings of the Albani in Italye. Qerazapes, commonly called Anacynaraxes, the thirtieth King succeeding vnto Ophrahanes, began his reigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Iosias, which lasted fortie two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Iosias, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeeres.

In this time of Iosias, was likewise the reigne of Pigmalion in Tyre; and the foundation of of Carthage by Dido; the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be 70. yeeres yonger than Rome, others about 400. yeeres elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred and fortie and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeere of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not very well to make cleere the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeeres, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion, we may well enough beleuee, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightlie reckon the difference of time, betwene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of Iosias, was a hundred fortie and three yeeres before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that wee might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Aul. Ep. 117.

I ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
A simulata modis pulchra,q; mirifica.
*T*alis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxist, erat mens,
*V*ita nec incestu lata cupidinibus,
*(N*amq; nec Aeneas vidit me Troius vnquam
*N*ec Lybiam aduenit, clasisbus Iliaci.
*S*ed furias fugiens, atq; arma procacis Iarbas,
*S*eruauit, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
*P*ectore transfixo, castos quos pertulit enses)
*N*on furor, aut laso crudus amore dolor.
*S*ic cecidisse iuuas: vixi sine vulnere fama,
*P*lta virum, posita membris oppetit.
*I*nvada cur in me simulasti Musa Maronem,
*F*ingeret ut nostra damna pudicitiae?
*V*os magis Historici lectores credite de me.
*Q*uam qui furta Demi concubitusq; canunt.
*F*alsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
*H*umanisq; deos asimulans vitij.

Which in effect is this,

I Am that Dido which thou here do'st see,
 Cunningly framed in beauteous Imagrie.
 Like this I was, but had not such a foule,
 As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Aeneas neuer with his Trojan hoast
 Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
 But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
 Not mou'd by furious loue or ialousie;
 I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
 Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
 This was my end; but first I built a Towne, Reueng'd my husbands death, liv'd with renowne.
 Why did'st thou stirre vp Virgil, enuious Muse, Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
 Readers beleuee Historians; not those Which to the world lowes thefts and vice expose.
 Poets are lyers, and for verses sake
 Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punic warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many histories: but in particular wee finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicily. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the Scare of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed, and prosecute in the meane while the Historie that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of Amasia his reigne. Of Iosias King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

*A*masia, the sonne of Iosaph, being twenty five yeeres old when his Father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherein he laboured so to demean himselfe, as his new beginning reigne might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to obserue; which howsoever it had become secretly despised since the time of Iehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conformance himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, euen whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods iustice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amasia from following the way, which led to such an euill end. Herefore, hauing learned of his father the arte of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traytors that had slaine King Iosias, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had bene, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda. Neuerthelesse, after this, when (belike) the noyle of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handle-work of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact; nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceiued his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections being well allayced, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such exemplary iustice, against the like attempts, Amasia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteene yeeres.

As Amasia gathered strength in Iuda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Iosias the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had bene; worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoiachaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politique Idolatrie; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoiachaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend vnto the prayers of this vngodlie Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subiects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the tenne Tribes recovered apace, but the fauour of God; which had bene infinitely more worth, I doe not finde, nor beleuee, that they sought; that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amasia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

a.Chron. 25. 7.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisba, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the Israelites vnder the Reigne of Iosias; or whether Iehoaahaz, wearied and broken with long aduersitie, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; wee finde that in the thirtieth yeere of Iosias, King of Iuda, Iosias the sonne of Iehoaahaz began to reigne ouer Israel in Samaria, which was in the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

It appeares that this young Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poore stocke that he receiued from his Father, often Chariots, fittie Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisba the Prophet, argue no lesse. For Iosias visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horse-men of the same, by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeere of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Iosias, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead child vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcase, which touch'd them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Iosias, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recouering all that the Aramites had vnrped, and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazias his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and ouerthrow by Iosias.

Hee happie successe which Iosias had found in his warre against the Aramites, was so such as might kinde in Amazias a desire of vndertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred a thousand seruicable men for the Warres; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre hee had very iust against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fifty yeeres bene vnreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the sloth and timorousnesse of his father Iosias. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres bene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that vnhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazias had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse, before hee had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with illsuccesse, if hee strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dimission, as an high disgrace, which to reuenge, they fell vpon a peece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoyle, which they carried away. But Amazias with his owne forces, knowing that God would be assistant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Countrie; over whom obtaining victorie, hee slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subiection of the Crowne of Iuda, which might bee the cause of that seueritie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount

Ser, Amazias tooke, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that hee left no garisons there, whereby hee might another yeere the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole Countrie. Howlozier it were, hee got both honour by the iourney, and gaines enough, had hee not lost himselfe.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise know not by what strange witchcraft, so befot this vnworthy King Amazias, that hee set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense vnto them.

For this when hee was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish and dreaming answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the Kings fancie; methinkes, hee should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account, wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God, vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. Hee had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as hee had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that hee was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason hee should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esaie hauing broken the yoke of Iacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaie had foretold, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazias did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vseth their owne industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly seene, that they, who entering into battaile, are carefull to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is wonne, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how hee got such a ground of aduantage; another, how hee gaue checke to such a battalion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Cannon; every one striving to magnifie himselfe, whilst all forget God, as one that had not bene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confess, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as hee which findeth better success; than hee did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdom and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so farre from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroically, as that by which the spirit of man aduanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptance, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Finge Deo.*

With this Philosophie Amazias (as appeares by his carriage) troubled not his head: hee had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to David: of which honour hee saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; hee hauing preailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That hee was dissembled with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impietie following) Iosephus doth testifie.

testifie, saying, That he despised God, and that being puffed up with his good success, of which neuertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Iosias King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Iosias was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Israelites, whom hee dismissed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him up, than the remembrance of an olde title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirtene or fouretee yeeres. Neuertheless it might be, that when he was thus prouoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Juda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazias desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answer from Iosias, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Iosias returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazias in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, that perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might bee made (according to that which Iosaphus had written) betwene a King of ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Aias, that when going to the warre of Tray, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but hee would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though hee did many valiant acts, hee had small thanks, and finally killing himselfe in a madnesse, wherein hee fell vpon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of burill. That Amazias did utter such words, I doe not finde: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, hee was rewarded with success according. The verie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when he had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weake people, trusting more in the site of their Country, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Iosias, who from so poore beginnings had rayled himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazias discovered much want of judgement, in undertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the business, when it was set on foot, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to bee good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Iosias on the contrarie side, hauing beene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the King of Juda, vsed that celeritie, which peraduenture had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Countrie, but presented himselfe with an Armeie in Juda, ready to bid battaile to Amazias, and saue him the labour of a long iourne. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda; who (besides the impression of feare which an invasion beares into people, not inured to the like) hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the iourne of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had somack enough to challenge the Patrimoine of Salomon, thought like another Dauid to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foole hardnesse might easly haue beene foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But mere humane wisdom, howsoeuer it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischiefe that fell vpon Amazias. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosaphus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himselfe; which hee did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armeie which sted, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither finde in the Scriptures nor in Iosaphus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shameful, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazias himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Iosias carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he had him procure that the gates might be opened to let him in and his Armeie; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable caitiue, with these dreadful words, that he durst do no other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwards being in weaker state, held out two yeeres, against Nebuchad-nessar, was utterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vied all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Iosias, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despise Amazias and his people, hee caused 400. cubits of the wall to be throwne down, and entered the Citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, hee sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazias, he dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Iosias from uniting Juda to the Crowne of Israel, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held Amazias prisoner. The end of Iosias his Reigne.

We may iustly marvell how it came to passe, that Iosias, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, & his owne entire, could be so content to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when he might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Juda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commodity that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbade the Israelite (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the sonne of Romelia got vpon Abaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Iosias had beene, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the kingdome of Juda.

But concerning that point, which, of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainly seene, that entering Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Iosias was vnable to concoct his owne profperitie. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing sure means of compulsion) he might haue made his owne, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had bene before. The faire marke which this opportunity presented, hee did not atyme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanelly buied, in leudling at the glory of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards haue been corrected well enough, if entering as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walls, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his countenance beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most reatous to the spoyle, yet should be most forborne. The Treasure wherewith Sesac, Hizael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Iosias, who though an Idolatour, yet yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed-edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had bene Officers of his owne Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mighty towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnadvised feare. For when the Citizens, nobeing disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first error; they will thinke vpon euery advantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the euils growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to poison the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easly tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example hercof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknesse of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard tearmes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betwene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their liberty, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretaries, and tearing them before his face, bad him found his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptorie words made the French be-thinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoeuer he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houises, vially drawes euery Citizen to saue his owne, leaving victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolute, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeede that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diversity of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easly depart from thence, with his booty safe, if the Army of Iuda, which had bene more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and giue him a check vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Army being vpon returne, and better laden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Iuda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet, who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrows thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seventh yeeres yeeres of Ioas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, ill might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could he haue either lent the Iudaean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisba, that after three victories, Ioas should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevaile vpon him this yeere, it being the last of his Reigne. That this was so, and that the Syrian, taking advantage of Ioas his absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie, we may euidently perceiue in that which is spoken of Ioas his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Israel from vnder the heauen, he preserved them by the hand of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas. This is enough to proue, that the victorious Reigne of Ioas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craesus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus cyther through indignation conceiued against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to set vpon him within the Walls: or though preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field, and to recouer by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these, Ioas was driuen to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iuda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste home-wards, where he found a sad wel-come, and being vterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsooke also his life in few moneths after, leaving his Kingdome to Ieroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant sonne.

The end of Amasia his Reigne and Life.

30 No man is able to ghesse how Amasia looked, when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skill in Armes, threatening to worke wonders, and set vp a new the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncafed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as hee had bene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doublelesse, were very many: for the shame that falls vpon an insolent man, seldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amasia (besides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, even of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not onely challenged a good man of Warre, being himselfe a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amasia, was a basely man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered, should they haue made his promise good? surely the hast which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soone haue bene rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when hauing trusted vp his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would haue serued to perswade him to leaue his load behind; had not their good King deliuered vp hostages, to secure his returne, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this vnhappy King: it had bene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But wee finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that hee continued an Idolator to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest proofe proofe that hee was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his aduersitie of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to vpbraide him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had beene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwayes be masters, wanted not plausible matter to reuine him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had bene ouercome in battell. Darius himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leauing it, before the Enemie was in sight, vnto Abaslem his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had receiued losses, when the Temple bare a part. If Ioas might so easily haue bene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was repured a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excuseable by necessitie of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than to dye to please them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Ioas; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters Commandements, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee bene as hally to flye, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to reach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, hee was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Vnworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, hee commanded them to yeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saued; the Enemie hauing wisely preferred the prisiue of a Lion that was Capitaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Shees that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was euen to be indeed. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fiftene yeeres following (so long hee out-liued his honour) we finde not that he stirred. As for his subiects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernment, yet wee may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuerer man. For the affected sowerneesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauitie of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they liue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazzle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they do usually mis-spent, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine & decciueable course; procuring in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence, especially when an vnable spirit, being ouer-perted with so high authoritie, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreame rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee else than strue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleue that he did not loue them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death prouided well enough for his owne securitie: but who should take vengeance (or vpon whom?) of such a murder, wherein euery one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen commandement or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amazias, carelesse of God, was carried headlong headlong by his owne afflictions; so his subiects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong furie, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driuen to forsake the Citie, and flye to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreame was the hatred conceived against him, and so generally, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspiratours (who troubled not themselves about raising an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vmost Citie of his Dominion Weltward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that he might haue made an easie escape (if he durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kinde of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the generall insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his body to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Iuda, after the death of Amazias.

It hath already bene shewed, that the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat yeeres, otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Reigne, or the foremost of his sonnes. But we are now arrived at a mere vacacion, wherein the Crowne of Iuda lay void eleauen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Iosephus, and therefore hard to be beleueed, were it not proued by necessary consequence.

Twice we finde it written, that Amazias, King of Iuda, liued after the death of Ioas King of Israel fiftene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazias, was about the end of fiftene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fiftenth yeere of Amazias was made King ouer Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Azarias, who is also called Azarias, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was eleauen yeeres later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expresse, that Azarias began to reigne in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam; the sixteenth yeere of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleauen yeeres cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter found.

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voided time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seauen and twentieth yeere of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azarias was eleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, fife yeeres old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeere might concur with the seauen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the Text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twenty seauen for seauenteene yeeres; and so, by making the seauenteenth yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the coniectures of so that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azarias began his Reigne being fife yeeres old; but then must we adde those eleauen yeeres which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessity necessity hath inforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the Kingdome of Israel? The space of time betwene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zacharias Reigne, and such another gap betwene the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hosea, haue made it easily to be admitted into Samarita, which the confideration of things as they stood in India, when Amazias was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the necessity of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, hauing so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to breake forth into such extremity. We neede not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inuested in all ornaments of Regality, is neuertheless exposed to many iniuries, proceeding from head-strong and forgetfull subiects.

As for their coniecture, who make Azaria to haue bene King but one and forty yeeres, after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the Text. The best opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam eleuen yeeres of Reigne with his Father, before he began to reigne single in the fifteenth of Amazias; did it not swallow vp almost the whole Reigne of Iotham, and extending the yeeres of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were onely current) and take at the shortest the Reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amazias, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THese Princes liuing with Amazias, and in the eleuen yeeres that followed his death, were Iotham and Ieroboam in Israel; Cephenes and Mycerinus in Aegypt; Syluius Alaudus, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Dionysius Phereclus, and Arisphron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Theleclus, in whose time the Spartians wan from the Albians, Geranthus, Amyle, and some other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Affyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazias, succeeding his father Ocraxapex or Anacynlaraxes, reigned twenty yeeres, and was slaine: the last of the eleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Reigne of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand, two hundred and forty yeeres. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he liued an unhappy life, knowing himselfe to be foyle, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and struiuing to counterfeite an harlot, that he thought it a great shame to liue vnder the command of so vnworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subiection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleus or Belosus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with the prophetic, did promise vnto Belosus himselfe the gouernment of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the businesse, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to conuere themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed fortie thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, burgathring such forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that ware, answere to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battalles he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearefull tearmes, that had not Belosus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it vpon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces ioyned themselves with his. The sodaine departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to least his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer-great security was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salmenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Ninive; which, till new aides that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it hauing bene prophesied, that Ninive should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Ninive, enough hath bene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battalles ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salmenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemed that he wanted Engines and skill to force those wals, which were a hundred foote high, and thicke enough for three Charriots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ran, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Palace, with his wiues, Eunuchs and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie Sicily of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and drinke, and make merry, encouraging others, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Affyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleuee that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath incessantly busied, in offense or else defense armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and obliuion hath appressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Vzzia.

The prosperitie of Vzzia, and of Ieroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Ieroboam. Of Zacharia, Salum, Menahem and Pekahia.

Vzzia, who is also called Azaria, the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Iuda, when he was sixteene yeeres old, in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas King of Israel. He serued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. He built Eloth, a Towne that stood nere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Iuda. He ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes he dismantled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories. Also he got the mastic ore some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iosephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seauen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand and sixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and speares, and helmes, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessours had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of all that had reigned in Iuda, since the time of Dauid; so were his riches and magnificent works, equall, if not superiour to any of theirs that had bene Kings betwene him and Salomon. For besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. He turned his Lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds conuenient for such husbandry. In other places he had Cattell feeding, wherof he might well keepe great store, hauing won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground seruing for pasturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardsmen, he built Towres in the wilderness. He also digged many Cisternes or Ponds. Iosephus calls them Water-courtes; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towres he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releue themselves therewith; questionlesse he tooke the onely course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreame drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vse of Trauailers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Townes among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Ierusalem, which Ioas had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, wherof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the diuision of the twelue Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, so (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he won the Royall Citie of Damascus, and he wan Hamath, with all the Countie there about from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is, (as the most expound it) vnto the wast deserts of Arabia, the end wherof was vndiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bene in the Reigne of Dauid.

But

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater: it was onely the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, wherinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites vnder the feete of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benedictions, as it had bene at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdom it selfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatry; nor the misery falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehu, that his sons, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged, but being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we, who finde no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Ieroboam the Sonne of Ioas, after a victorious reigne of one and forty yeeres, had ended his life, it seems in all reason that Zacharia his sonne, should forthwith haue bene admitted, to reigne in his stead, the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needs haue appeared base; and the vertue of the last King, hauing bene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twentie yeeres did passe, before Zacharia the sonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme consent, receiued as King. The true original causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue bene wanting, vpon which, the wilddome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the Army (who afterwards slew one another, so fast, that in foureteen yeers there reigned fiftie Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what he could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia, vntill, after many yeeres, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeelde all quietly to the son of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twenty yeeres, we finde by the difference of time, betwene the fiftieth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seauen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last sixe moneths wherof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeede that by supposing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father cleauen yeeres, doe cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the Reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelue yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the Kingdom of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempred, than as is already noted. But I choose rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the Word, than this doubtfull coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Reigne vnto his owne, which was it selfe indeede so long, that he may well seeme to haue begun it very young: for I doe not thinke, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer reigne, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant Dauid.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was voided, before the reigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his Reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iustifie the iudgement of God, whereby he was slaine. He was the last of Iehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may haue bene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the propheticke hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that God's promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant giuen to Salum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had bene giuen to Iehu, for the slaughter of Ieroboam, and for the eradication of Ababs house.

Zacharia

Zacharia having bene fixe months a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a month in Samaria. What his Sallum was, I doe not finde; save onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tiphsh or Thapsi, and the coast thereof, even from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphsh, and all that were therein, or therabouts, but heript vp all their women with childe, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty bene vsed in reuenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would haue bene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vsed such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Dilaine, and other private passions, to haue bene the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, (and as it seemes) in the beginning of his Reigne, Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appealed, with a thousand talents of siluer, leauied vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either invited Pul thither, or (like came vncalled) fought to vsd his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menahem, that his Reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after tenne yeeres, his tyrannic ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for he reigned onely two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Peka, the Sonne of Remaliah, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shall be. There needs no more to be said of Menahem, and his Sonne, saue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as we finde in Iosephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palestina; it will shortly follow in order of the Storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belofus (called also Beleses, and by some, Phul Belochus) who ioyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-lived the happiness wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Vzzia his Reigne and life.

AS the scale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preserve the lineage of Dauid, in the person of Iosias; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crowne of Israel, when the hatred borne to his Father Amazias, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the dayes of Zacharia (which vnderstood the vision of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, vpon the altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremity bene so helpfull to the Kings of Juda, that meeregatitude, and ciuill policie, should haue held backe Vzzia from inchoing thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had bene silent in this case, and nor forbidding it. How soeuer the King forgot his durie, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgot not to assist them. Azarias the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azarias foue score other Priests, valiant men, but that valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his durie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Iosephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that he threwned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vntill they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeede, enlargeth the Storie, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled some furlonges, till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high wayes, and spraying the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earthquake, he saith, that the rooffe of the Temple did cleme, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue bene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earthquake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misse-reckon the times. For the Earthquake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seauen and thirtie yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this accompt, haue bene then vnborne: for he was but fixe and twenty yeeres old, when he began to reigne as King. Therefore, thus farre onely we haue assurance; that while Vzzia was wrath with the Priests, the leprosie rose vp in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to lue in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophet: which lived in the time of Vzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Agypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Isai, Amos, Obladiah, and Ionas. It is not indeede set downe, when Isai, or Obladiah, did prophesie: but if it the Prophets, whose times are not expresse, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these time was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefully bene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Isai; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue prophesied in the dayes of Iosias, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto me, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Ninive was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the reigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esai, the first of the foure great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esai was great indeede, not onely in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is rectified, who thinke him to haue bene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellency, both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelt the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Sauour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Bacchias was King of Agypt, and the ninth yeere of his Reigne, by our computation whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vezia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Asychis followed in the Kingdome of Agypt, vnto him succeeded Ansis; and these two occupied that Crowne fixe yeeres. Then Sabacus, an Athiopian, became King of Agypt, and held it fiftie yeeres, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Vezia his Reigne and life. Of these and other Aegyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermeddled with the businesse of Iuda.

In Athens, the two last yeeres of Atriphron his twenty, the seauen and twentieth of Thepeius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Aschylus his three and twenty, to made euen with the two and fiftie of Vezia: as likewise did in Alba the last seauen of Siluius Auentinus his seauen and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Siluius Procas, and two and twenty the first of Syluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdome, in the first of Vezia, wherein, after eight and twenty yeeres, his Sonne Sardanapalus succeeded him, and reigned thirty yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, betwene him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander into too great vncertainty in the Story of the Assyrian Kings, who haue already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a-part in Ninieue and Babylon.

IT is that which hath formerly bene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be iudged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was shewne vpon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he vsed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold, not onely the Citie and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezzeling whereof his life had bene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) onely the Soueraigntie to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the Citie of Ninieue, permitting the Citizens neuertheless to take and carry away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slackning too much the reines of his owne Soueraignty, he did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enioyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom we finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held some Townes of the Medes; and the ciuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioeces, the first of Arbaces his Line, did make in that gouernment, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, & tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Ninieue, and subuersion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honor, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Ninieue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their Historie is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it stands; then, producing the obiections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe therunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set downe a-part the severall authorities and arguments of sundry men adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: to which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine owne, but merely led by those reasons which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weak.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entered Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annus his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtil, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that he reigned eight and forty yeeres, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalsar his Sonne, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach preuailed. The truth of this, if Annus his Metaphemes were sufficient prooffe, could not be gainesaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoeuer Annus his Authors deserue to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintain this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belosus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who ioyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernments: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Ninieue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe from aspiring to recover the Soueraignty, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because the two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed ouerdangerous euen to Rome it selfe, that was Mistress of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pul; or what must this Pul haue bene (of whose desertings, or entremedling, or indeed of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principal parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belosus, whose neere Neighbourhood gaue him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and silver that had bene in the Palace of Ninieue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Ninieue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belosus had; which Pul, if he were not Belosus, is likely to haue wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie as farre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belofus, Belofus, and Belofus, (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Assyages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus, having seled his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leasure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may finde every one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who ioyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, meerey for the loue of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adioyning to their barraine quarters, might yeerely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not onely likely to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemed that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie neighbour of Ieroboam, recoined their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in so good rearmes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity; the memorie whereof was auailable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the Riuer came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadzer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King reigning so farre off as Ninine, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath bene said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crowne of Israel were worn by no man in three and twenty yeeres, then is it likely that Belofus was either vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was fauourable, and first disconcered. This might haue compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did passe the Riuer of Euphrates, as soone as he found likelihood of making a prosperous iourney, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we haue made it: for three and twenty yeeres leasure would haue afforded better opportunity, which ought not to haue bene lost.

For answer herunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mighty, betwene the times of Arbaces and Deiaces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restraints the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some haue coniectured that all Assyria was giuen to Belofus (as an overplus, besides the Prouince of Babylon which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly receiued, is, that he did onely encroach vpon that Prouince by little and little, whilst Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelue yeeres betwene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and setting of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, besides the reformation of Ninine, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Reigne, if perhaps he liued to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather serue to proue that Phul and Belofus were one person, forasmuch as the iourney of Phul against Israel was not made vntill Belofus could finde leasure; and the time of aduantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter; namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrey so farre distant as Palestina, was likely to haue bene, at least, named in some Historie, or if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to haue bene spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times, whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vntolte warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vter desolation of Ninine, must needs haue so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty yeeres space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Ninine, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belofus to subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Syrians, and other war-like Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuill dissension of the inhabitants, and the bordering ennie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alleadged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belofus; euen as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Astahshate, and Absuerus, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countries, haue called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Ariaxares: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither beheredit any thing that hath bene written of old, nor neede to trouble our selues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, which they alleadged in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belofus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardacempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Belofus were that Phul which invaded Israel, if he and his posterity reigned both in Ninine and in Babylon if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Afar, from whom Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must like Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanassar, who is knowne to haue reigned in those yeeres, which Ptolemy the mathematician hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Mardac, who supplanted Afar-haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary party, will not be satisfied with such coniectures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaliking that into pieces, hope to burst throw all the promises, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belofus were several Kings. This consequence is so plain, that it needes no confirmation. To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworne to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and none of Assyria. This is proued by his name, which is meerey Chaldean; whereas Salmanassar, the last part of Salmanassar stands, is proper to the Assyrians.

It is likewise proued by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolemy drawes that Epochæ, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Merodach, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Esfy his compendius, by the former part of his name, or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

Esfy 151.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar, which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captiue some part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Prouince of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will not follow that he was King of Babylon in itselfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign ouer Babylon in the first yeere of Hezekia, at which time Salmanassar tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger, who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belofus, for the prouing that Phul and Belofus were not sundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painfull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might haue won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annus his Authors, giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howsoever I beleue nothing that Annus his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stampe asseirme, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so fquemish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellows alleged in it: I haue (somewhat peraduenture too often) already spoken my minde of Annus his Authors: neuertheless, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and seruet to explaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger tearmes them, meaning, if I mistake him not; good silly fellowes) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belofus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or vnwilling to reade. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annus, though disliking him in generally) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betwene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or auoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaliger reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleueing, that one man in two languages might be called by two seuerall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophetas I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Scal. Canon. l. 3.

Whether Nabonassar was an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negatiue. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeans, doth not proue him to haue bene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue bene also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the fifth, who was borne in Gans, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all

Sciences,

Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Schollers: but it seemes, that hee and his posteritie, by giuing them such wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vn-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawne from the vnlike found and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon in itselfe: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing faue coniecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Esai, concerning Merodach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is laid of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reigne in the first yeere of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections vntill I meet with their subiect in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach liued and was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I heere satisfie him; that how strong soeuer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingeniously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the sonne of Nabonassar, hee had bene deceived.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their Storie, who taking Pul to bee a distinct person from Belofus or Belsus, haue in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Asarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And heere I must first confesse mine want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, indeed, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Joseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Caluissius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not bene carefull to giuevs notice, how long Belofus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Palsassar, did reigne, (perhaps because he found it not exprest in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I finde it contriued by Augustinus Tornielus; who onely of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belofus, and his Posteritie, of whom hee hath the like remembrance. This Tornielus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last yeere; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, found iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse hee hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe so right vnto Tornielus; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing, and with that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would he haue instructed and emboldened me, to write more fully and leste timorously in other things, which now I haue not leisure to requite. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared lest it had ouer-hastily passed out of my hand, and bene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that invaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were slaine by Abraham, I find him aduenturing, C. 1. §. 13 as I haue done, to say, that they may probably be thought to haue bene some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belofus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belofus, and they two prevailed so farre, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betwene Octavian, Anthonie, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seat of his Empire in Media, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeeres, it came to passe, by the just judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Tornellus himselfe leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus deuided, how Phul and Belofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, he orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty yeeres. Theglathafasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuersly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuersifie them) succeeding vnder as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuersifie them) succeeding vnder to Phul, reigned three and twentie. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned seven: and when he was slaine, Afarhaddon his sonne ten yeeres, in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had bene more likely) Belofus usurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threethree and eight yeeres; at the least threethree and eight yeeres did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Bisladan, are assigned fixe and twentie yeeres: then two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twentie to Nabonassar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornellus would haue conceiued two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Assyria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adheres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the suddain King of Assyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept of the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to haue happened, vntill his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had bene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Division it selfe, and the ciuill Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of? Questionlesse, the interuening of some Treaties by Belofus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon the following, were matters of farrelesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoyded; but that eyther we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue bene exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to haue bene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recover such strength in foure yeeres, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Government to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all; for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but (speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be so vnlawfull to thinke, that some of Annius his tales, let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood: why then is it said, that Phul did reigne in Assyria eight and forty yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and iudicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgerye (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not beleued for his owne sake; though for our owne sakes we make vse of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are vnwilling our selues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herein we shall haue this commoditie, that we may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, against whom wee shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathafasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of fixe and twenty yeeres the one, and fiftene the other; Tornellus hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the latter of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vsing the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, faue our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Afarhaddon, Tornellus giues the same length of reignes, which is found in Metasthenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vnto themselves, as may very well be allowed vnto a man so iudicious as is Tornellus: and yet I could wish that hee had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this businesse, wherein hee himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must haue done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans; filling vp all the space betwene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threethree and eight yeeres of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belofus might haue begun his reigne somewhat later than Phul: for threethree and eight yeeres would seeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no young man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer? Indeed, eight and forty yeeres had bene somewhat of the most, considering that hee seemes by the storie to haue bene little lesse, at such time as he ioyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty yeeres, did well deserue that note (which Tornellus aduisedly giues) that if his reigne extended not so farre, then the reigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonassar.

Neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Tornellus, in conjecturing, nor the modestie of Scaliger and Scetus Calanissus, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend onely vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discouerie, that is, eyther by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of floate-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riues, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediable obliuion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Neg. seruidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreae finitimum litus, Durataq. sole Nixes,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vinctus aequora Nautae.

Nor

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keepe the greedie Merchant thence.
The subtil Shipmen way will finde, Storme neuer so the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serue onely to mislead such discouersers as rashly belecue them; drawing vpon the publishers, eyther some angry curses, or well deserued scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had beene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which me thought, might haue done eyther benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters viues Island; saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for her; that she, in imagination, might haue an Island of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, wee need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if we haue it not already) the perfect truth of these vncertainties: would it bee more shame to haue beleued in the meane while, Annius or Tornilius, than to haue beleued nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit, which wee giue to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be giuen to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornilius, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Historians than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing morcouer gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generally, so to deale as Pacuvius in Scipiad with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-houise, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty; for as fast as euery name was read, all the town cried, Let him die; but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the Person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the olde should be kept for lacke of better.

§ V. Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this diuision of the Assyrian Empire, followes the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the same King Pezzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeere. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Iotham: yet is not that opinion so generally, but that Authors, waighie enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accompts, we ioine them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

Their Olympian games and exercises of actiuitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwile Pisa, neere vnto Elis; where also Iupiter

Iupiter Temple in Elis, famous among the Gracians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympus. These games were exercised from euery fourth yeere compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neere the river Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeeres, till Iphitus by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lycurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Gracians, till the reigne of Theodosius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: others thinke that they were disolued vnder Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Gracian times, and their stories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Caistor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whole time the feuen wise Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Craesus, and Craesus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true yeere of the World, and the reigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly iumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osus, or Azarath.

Eusebius, who is contrarie to himselfe in this reckoning, accounts with those that finde the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundredth and sixth yeere after Troy, yet yeeteleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeere of Pezzia, which is (as I finde it) two yeeres later.

Erastothenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and feuen yeeres after Troy, reckoning the yeeres that passed betwene; to whom Diomysius Halicarnassens, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Erastothenes. From the taking of Troy, to the descent of Hercules his Posterite into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeeres; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore yeeres; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernment in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeeres. In this account the first yeere of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbering the yeeres from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue been in the foure hundredth and eight yeere current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads, must needs teach vs how to finde when they became.

To this good vse, we haue the ensuing yeeres, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided by the same Erastothenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred fourescore and seuentene yeeres; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortie yeeres; forwards to the victorie of Lysander, feuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole summe ariseth to 453. yeeres; which number he otherwile also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one & fiftieth yeere of Pezzia, we haue arguments grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomical calculation of sundrie Eclipses of the Sunne, as of that which happened, when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Armie to invade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeere of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee reigned thirty yeeres; they who giue him but twentie nine yeeres of reigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iustine, Eusebius, and others) begin a yeere later, which comes all

Abaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Balim, and burnt his Sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp not farr from Ierusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnam, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vfed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carcasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which vnnatural, cruell, and diuillish Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which Saint Hierome vpon the tenth of Mathew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudaea, diuers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of Aeneids, — Sanguine placatis, &c. and Silius, — Postere cade Deos. Saturne is said to haue brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many soules into the Riuer of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be throwen in and drowned. The Demill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in so much, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them beleue, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to be offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred vp, and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appease him: who besides these forenamed Nations had instructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Alessia, of Galatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these his seruices. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acoila writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Demill vnder this fearefull seruitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickednesse of this King Abaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damascus, and Peckab the Sonne of Rezeiah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Iudaea, and besieged Ierusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, posselt himselfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the sonne of it, and Peckab slaundered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Iudaeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Masfiah, the Sonne of Abaz was also slaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouvernour of his house: and Elcanah the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites led away to Samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered backe againe.

As Israel and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; so the Edomites and the Philistines, who cuermore attended the ruine of Iudaea, entred vpon them from the South; and took Belechem, Aislon, Gaderoth, Secho, Tinnah, and Gemza, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Abaz saw himselfe environed on all sides, and that his Idols and dead gods gaue him no comfort, he sent to the Affirian Tiglathpileser, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the siluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings House.

Tiglathpileser wanted not a good example to follow; in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father hauing lately made himselfe from a Provinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Affiria, had a little before led him the way into Iudaea, invited by Menabem, King of Israel. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly harkened to Abaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himselfe, he was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprize: because (as I haue said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, hauing now, with the treasures of Ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first invaded the Territorie of Damascus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adads, who began with Dauid, & ended with this Abaz. At Damascus Abaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sent it to Rezeiah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Ierusalem, whereon at his returne he burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath posselt all Babylon, and and the rest beyond Iordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Amanasse. And then passing the Riuer, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Abaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posselt himselfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it seemeth, enforced Abaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechias, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Abaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne he died: but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Iuda.

With Abaz liued Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned 40. yeeres, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias finde Anticarnus in stead of this Medidus, to haue reigned 50. yeeres. Sofarnus his Successour, to whom they giue 50. yeeres.

Tiglath Pileser held the Kingdome of Affiria, all the reigne of Abaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Sonne may seeme to haue reigned with him some part of the time. For wee finde that Abaz did send vnto the Kings of Assur to helpe him. The Genea note fies, that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that prooueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Sonne, who reigned with his Father, as hath bene said before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had bene hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedaemon, a hundred and thirty yeeres after Lycurgus the first according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning farr later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynr Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeere, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Abaz died Aschylus, who had ruled in Athens euery since the fiftieth yeere of Pezia. Alcarnon the thirteenth of the Medontida, or Gouvernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Aschylus, and was the last of their Gouvernors: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouvernors for life; which ending in this Alcarnon, they created a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kinde of Hieronymaster, or Gouvernour of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke begins, in the first yeere of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnassens in the first of the seuenth Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeere by the Syluij, of the race of Aeneas, tooke end in the same Abaz time: the foundation of Rome, being layd by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeere of the same King. Codoman builds in the eleuenth of Abaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke hee should others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Europsius, Orosius, and others, figure the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassens, Solinus, Amiobennus, Clemons, Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seuenth: who seeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best account.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelagi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Italie, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sican, Aufones, Arunci, Rutuli, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Sterculius; and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, is questionable a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should bee hard to finde one Countrie or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuitt. And yet, as most fables and poetical fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which eyther by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life; and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Coryus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because men are stonie-hearted, and because the Greeke people, and stones, are neere in found, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion stones conuerted into men, as at other times men into stones: in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturnes hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that olde opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Ath; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus absconditus. For it can not be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if it be deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satur, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reynecius doth coniecture that the Ceteans, who defended of Cethim, the Sonne of Iauin, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by Strabo as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reynecius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Asolians held in Asia, called Elae, or Elain, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citum, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (T) differing onely in the strength or weaknesse of vterance, which is found betwene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Citum, or Kithim, the Sonne of Iauin, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Asolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Asolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elaius, the Hauen Elaius, the people Elaites, the Cities Elaius, Elaius, and Elaitis, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elaites, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlkely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in found and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabinus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elaius (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elaitis) be named of the Ceteans Latinius. Reynecius pursuing this likelihood, thinke, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia was slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Ceteans who (fearing what euill might befall themselves by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reynecius farther thinke, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elaius, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elaius, and then Latinius. That this name of Elaius may haue beene taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elaius, who were Sons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betwene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost interchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippothens of the race of Elaius, in whose Possession it continued vntill the last. Again, the name of Latinius, hauing a deriuative sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the coniecture of Reynecius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which haue written the originals of Latium.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill Æneas his coming.

THE Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrivall of Æneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus and Latinius. Of Saturne there is nothing remembered, saue what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be appurtenant to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them Kronos, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he liued, may very well admit him to haue bene the same: but the names of Sterces, and Sterculius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the soyle which he laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good House-man, The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in forth-lying, or diuination, by the sight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gaue to Euander the Arcadian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italie the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatna, the sister of Faunus, who was also his Wife, as all Historians agree, she was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie, which praise in her must needs haue been much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meerely incestuous. It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any child, neither doe we reade of any other Wife which he had, saue onely that Virgil giues vnto him Latina as his Sonne, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, saue onely that her abode was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturne.

Of the name Latinius, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Sabinus takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Citie, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynecius, the difference consisting almost in this onely, that Sabinus calls Telephus, the Sonne of Hercules, whereas Reynecius makes him his Nephew, by a Sonne of the same name. This Latinius hauing obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his onely Daughter and Heire Latina, to Turnus the son of Penia, who was sister to Amata Latinius his Wife.

But when Æneas arrived in those parts with fiftene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarcked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes, to the Vessels then vied, about one thousand and two hundred men: then Latinius finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moved with the great reputation of Æneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who himselfe here-herewith, fought to auenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were the an Italian, she could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Aeneas; vnclesse we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who serued in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reynolds holds her an Asiatique, and thinkes withall, that Lauius was borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Italicarnassus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro, who calleth her Palatia; which name very well might be deriued from the Greeke name Pallas. Amata, which signifies beloued, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom he tooke toserue as a Nunne of Vesta, wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lauius, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countie, was established in that race: wherein it continued vntill it was ouer-grown by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. III.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

Aeneas himselfe being of the royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Cressida, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius, whose surname was Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) beene surnamed Ius. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lauius, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauius was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably and vsing her as a Queene, did foster her yong sonne, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lauium, which Aeneas had built and called after his new wifes name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight and twenty yeeres: Virgil giues him thirtie; others five and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his decesse, there arose contention betwene Sylvius, the sonne of Aeneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauius, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enioyed, leauing the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvij.

Alia, called also Rhea and Sylvia.

Romulus, Remus.

The most of these Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes: who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus, who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Procas, was deposed of his Kingdome by his brother Amulius, by whom also his sonne Agellus was slaine, and Alia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceiued two sonnes, either by her Vncle Amulius, as some thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets saie; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Vncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Amtho, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preferred, who afterward reuenged the cruelty of their Vncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he reigned, I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome, vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Citius Clutius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Sufferius, the succesor of Clutius, who succceeded the Estate of Alba vnto the Romans, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatij, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curiatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Alban forces against the Peientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romans to such an ouerthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with; Tullus, who notwithstanding this falshood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whom C. Iulius Caesar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Sovereignie of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posterity; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was so reuiued, that seldom, if euer, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

Of Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betwene Euhrpates and the Ocean where broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, hauing beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Por-

so the fifteenth yeere of Abaz may haue bene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hofea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Abaz was almost compleat, some would finde the meane how to disioyne the first of Ezekia from the fifteenth of Abaz, placing him yet one yeere later, of which yeere, Abaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places, it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

^{2 Kin. 19. 31.} In the fourteenth yeere of Ezekia, Sennacherib invading India, and the Countie adjoining, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroake from Heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned fouretee of his nine and twenty: and the same yeere was that miracle scene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twenty fifth of April, in the Julian yeere, being then Thursday. I haue not seene any workes of Scultet; but surely to finde a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. How focuer it be, the fifteenth yeere of Ezekia agreed vpon, and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsual in like cases, that Abaz slept with his Father, and Ezekia his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like, at the death of Iehosaphat, and succession of Iehoram, whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reigne whilest his Father liued, wee haue already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first month of his reigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernment; we plainly finde it to haue bene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Abaz had shut vp, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bene for many yeeres neglected, and brake downe the brassen Serpent of Azofes, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Nehustan, which signifieth a lump of brasse. He did also celebrate the Pass-over with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorn.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memorials of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his reigne, Salmanassar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hofea King of Israel had practised with Soe King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samarita, and in the third yeere (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced in, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nimue, in whose Seates and Places the Affrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ans, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Preface of the Holy Land.

These later Affrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to ioyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Affrian, Chaldean Kings, diuersity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Abaz and Ezekia, Kings of India, and of Hofea King of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolomie makes mention mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the same, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both those points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient prooffe from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that betwene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seauen hundred fortie and fixe yeeres: at which distance of time the reigne of Salmanassar was. One great prooffe: hercof is this, which the same Bucholerus alleadgeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables, that the same Bucholerus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomie, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Ezekia, King of India. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betwene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betwene Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Funtius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samarita, to the destruction of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three yeeres: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolomie, betwene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomie seemes to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeeres, than the destruction of Ierusalem, we are to vnderstand that he took Samarita in the eighth yeere of his reigne, so that the seauen foregoing yeeres added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accounts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomie. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seauen yeeres. Now if we adde to these one hundred twentie seauen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnezzars yeere, before the Citie and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and fortie yeeres. In so plaine a case more proofes are needelesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolomie placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twentie and two yeeres, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the authoritie of any History; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnsuited, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to haue bene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeere of whose reigne, is, according to Ptolomie, concurrent in part with the twentie seauen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeere of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seauen yeeres, seauenteene dayes, and cleauen houres: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Aegyptian moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty sixth of February; and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Aegyptian yeeres. But how does this proue, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleue Mardocempadus to haue bene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countie-man Lidyus hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornellius, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologic, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduise to Salger; and other good authority, I know none in this business) any fence more nearly prouing the succcession of Aterodach to Nabonassar, than the place now lastre-heard: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the asncere succcession of William the Conqueror, de-than (that I may vse a like example) the asncere succcession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue bene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely goe on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Sal- manassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our booke, when they finde something in it, agreeing with Amnius, inasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are assigned to Belus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good History naming any others, that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomically obseruations, fitly concurring, with the yeeres that are attributed to these, or numbered from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of Iudaea from Sennacherib.

When Salmanassar was dead, and his son Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeere of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on, at such time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanassar, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezen King of Damascus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had vnderaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it seemes) a purpose to acknowledge when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it seemes) a purpose to invade Aegypt, sent one part of his Armie to lye before Ierusalem. Now though Ezechias (feeling this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold: wherewhile presented Sennacherib, now set downe before Lachis in Iudaea, yet vnder the colour of becoming assistance, and to force the King of Iudaea to deliuer hostages, the Assyrian environed Ierusalem with a grosse Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezechias directed his three great Counsellors, to parlie with Rabshaces, ouer the Wall, and to receiue his demands: who vsed three principall arguments to perswade the people to yeelde themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steuard, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabshaces to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Iewish, yet he with a louder voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, he made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, be inforced to eat their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine. Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Aegypt, from whom the Iudeans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken Staffe, on which whose leane, pierce his owne hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had bene preferred euesince Moses time: and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations:
 whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by no means to relye on him, for hee would deceiue them. But finding the people faine (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himselfe left the Assyri- an forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Lisba in Iudaea, either to informe him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to conferre with him concerning the forme him of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom hee partly aduised, and partly threatened to submit himselfe: vnto the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias as sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Esay, which had lately bene sent to Rab- saces, receiued from him comfort, and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also besought aide from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of *Sennacherib*s letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true. That the King of A- shur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no Gods, but the worke of mans hands, euen wood and stone, &c.

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haste of Ierusa- lem, was, that he might thereto haue retrained his Armie, which was departed asit seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Aegypt, for feare of Tarhaca: and though the Chri- stians are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chroni- cles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient He- rodotus, and out of him Iosephus, and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might iustly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petraea adioyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Aegypt, to be Vulcanus Priest; and reporteth that the reason of *Sennacherib*s returne from Pelusium in Aegypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyled the rest of their weapons in that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembered Ioseph 1. 10. c. 1.
 by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more vrgent. Saint Hierome vpon the seauen and thirty of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus ci-teth somewhat otherwile than his words lye, reports *Sennacherib*s retreat in these words.

Pugnasse autem Sennacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Aegyptios & obsidisse Pelusiam, iam-que extructis aggeribus urbi capiende, venisse Tarachum Regem Arabiam in auxilium, & una nocte iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrii pestilentia corruisse narrat Herodotus: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaica scriptor Historie, quorum fides depreparis libris petenda est; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians sought against the egyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Accounts were built for taking of the Citie, Tarhaca King of the Ethiopians came to helpe them, and that in one night, neere Ierusalem, one hundred eightie five thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of *these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer Ierusalem,* of Chaldaean Stories, whose credit is to be taken from their owne Bookes. Out of Esay it is of the Armie gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt seey 2. 5. c. visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noyse, a whirlewind and a tempest, and a flame of denouncing fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted: Sennacheribus autem ab Aegyptiaco bello reuertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub Rablaciis imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus immixtus deletum, prima nocte pestilentiam Ierusalem oppugnare coepit, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octogin-ta quinque millibus Militum; qui clade territus, & de reliquis copiis sollicitus, maxima itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam quae Ninus dicitur. Vbi paulo post peruincit Seniorum & filij suis, Adramelech, & Sennari, quibus amissis: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Araci, quem praecipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ab patricidium a popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, Alaracoldas minor filius in Regnum success-it; Sennacherib (saith Iosephus) returning from the Aegyptian warfare, found there his Armie, which he had left vnder the command of Rablaces, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begunne to assault the Towne: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronells.

With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adramelech and Sennari or Sharzer, hee lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Aralaces, or Nesroch: whom hee especially worshipped. These his Sonnes being for their parricide chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, Alaracoldas his younger Sonne succeeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reigne sent new troupes out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his Grand-father Salmanassar. What this Nesroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certaine, that Venus Frania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus 1. 7. writte. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonnes had to murder him; but the most likely it is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, that it was fiftie five dayes after Senacherib re- turne, ere he was murdered by the sonnes; during which time he flew great num- bers of the Israelites in Nineue, till the most iust God turned the Sword against his owne breitt.

§. III.

Of Ezekias his sicknesse and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratu- lated him.

After this marvellous deliuey, Ezekias sickned, and was told by Isaiah, that he must dye: but after he had besought God with teares for his deliuey, Isaiah, as he was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fiftie yeres. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrary way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Jerome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His discafe seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Boole or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldeæ had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the King- dome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoever thy fathers haue layed up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekias should haue got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yere before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with advantage, and made Ezekias richer vpon the suddaine than euer he had bene: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boast- ing. After this time Ezekias had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life; he dyed, having reigned nine and twentie yeres. One onely offensive Warre he made, which was against the Philistims with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembered in Ecclesiasticus) he deuised to bring water to Ierusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he reioyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadours of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Com- mander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vsurped that State himselfe, in the last yere of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarhaddon, who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembering, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his owne master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunity which this Kings weakenesse did offer, as it had bene for Belochus to make vse of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe beloued of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerful, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The assertion of this history is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the com- mon opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut a-funder the Line of Ninus, there were onely fise Kings.

But forasmuch as the last yere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue bene an hundred and one yeres, of which, the last five and twentie were spent with Ezekias; vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the reigne of Ezekia: Of the difference found betweene sundry Authours, in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezekia: of Candaces, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Heireules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medius, and after him Gordiceus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in feuerall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sonnes reigning with the fathers, haue caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion; or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesias and Annus his Metaphyses, haue bene faulty, as neither of these two Authours isouer highly commended of antiquitie: so it is, that the names, number, and length of reignes, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medius, and Gordiceus as contemporaries with Ezekias, for as much as they were so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authours haue deliuered it.

Annus his Metaphyses orders them and their reignes thus:

Arbaces .	28
Mandanes .	50
Sofarmon .	30
Articarmis .	50
Arbians .	22
Artens .	40
Attines .	22
Asybarus , with his sonne Apanda .	20
Apanda alone.	30
Darius with Cyrus .	36

who reigned 40 yeres.

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annus made his Metaphyses follow Diodorus, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Arbaces .	28
Mandanes .	50
Sofarmon .	30
Artycas .	50
Arbians .	22
Artens .	40
Artymes .	22
Ariabannus .	40

who reigned 40 yeres.

Asybara. } the continuance of these two he doth not mention.
Asyges.

Mercurator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them all so agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to me an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by coniectures founded vpon

Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medius and Cardicus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardicus were Diodorus his Archimus, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces.	28	} reigned } yeeres.
Sosarmus.	30
Medius.	40
Cardicus.	15
Deiaces.	54
Phraortes.	24
Cyaxares.	32
Asyages.	38

These names, and this course of succession I retain; but adde vnto these Cyaxares the sonne of Asyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the first that were chosen Gouernors of Albani for ten yeeres, that is, of Charops, Asimides, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, save that Rome was built in his first yeere, of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde onely the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of iustice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed vpon his owne Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in vnchastity, caused her to be lockt vp with an Horse, giuing to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King and founder of that Citie Romulus, did reigne both before, and some what after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Maonia. Lydus the sonne of Atys reigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if we beleue such authority as we finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, consecrated vpon Argos, who came of Alcaus the son of Hercules, by Irdana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heracleids continued reigning fiftie yeeres (in which two and twentie Generations passed) the sonne continually succeeding the father. Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last of his race, who boasted so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that he could not be content to enioy her, but would needes enforce one Gyges, the sonne of Dasyllus, to behold her naked body; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queene perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and vnderstanding the matter, tooke it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight yeeres, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one yeere before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardys reigned nine & forty yeeres; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie yeeres; and finally Crasus, the son of Halyattes, fourteeny yeeres: who lost the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crasus his Progenitor dispossest, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned severall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Myrians; in Greece, the Lacedaemonians, Messenians, Rhodiens, Corinthians, and Argiues; and from the Argiues, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusans; besides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heracleids that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my selfe to take notice in the time of their severall reignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliuerance of Israel from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Iuda, when Egypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his Historie of the holy warre.

The emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power; when it contended with Assyria for the Maistrie. Of Cham the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath bene saide already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must heere againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbear to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the moutnes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances proving them to haue bene Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, wee ought not to beleue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed onely fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is exprest, haue reigned longer than fortie yeeres. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there, any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy Warre, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to finde names enow, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Samar an Arabian; who was Soldan before & after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalricke made vpon Egypt. Heereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Samar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Briefly, Sanar such to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracou, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargan's; but he enioyed it not: for in few daies after, hee was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadeth gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilst he might haue the profit of it, and enioy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracou with his Turkes, to whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leaue him, and quietly go their way home. They leize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arriuall of more company from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, hee gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischiefe ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadeth particularly. In his owne Title, Syracou, Captaine of the Turkes that had bene in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet that false prophet, the Soueraignetie ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weaknesse of the Egyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vp in Armes; and Syracou, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces hee hasteth into Egypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keepe the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behooued him: for by their admirable valour, hee finally draue the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quicklie told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue bene King in title onely, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition that he should abide by it. He promisseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Egypt, for this behouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much sooner he tooke vpon him) was subiect to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Casarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadeth to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of *Ethiopian*s, which with all diligence, did reuerence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed workes, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange birds, vnkowne in those parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was vndiscovered. The farther they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueyed them into other Courts within these; as farre excelling the former, as the former did surpass ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to relictarise how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbilhop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entring the Presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he wore about his necke, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtain, behinde which the Caliph sat. Presently the transe, wrought with Gold and pearls was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting with great Maestie on a throne of gold, hauing few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almaricke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargain; which the Egyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Casarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide itselfe; Princes, that will hold covenants, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for wee will make no bargain with your Glove. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maestie of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his seruants) he vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all, dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, wee may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: wee see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: wee see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royall power; making warre & peace, entreating, & repelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Egypt tributarie to a foreign Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and as thy word shall all my people be armed, onely in the Kings Throne will I be above thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt.

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approve the censure of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since Ioseph time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude which he brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his iudgement good; that he assumes this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the ptolomies (excepting Ptolomeus Lagi, and his sonne Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were euen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrie afforded, were indeed sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning Egypt, is set downe by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who liued in the same age; was, in few yeeres after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Casarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians haue honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we finde by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Countrie; after whom it follows that we should make enquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherres, whether he were Vchorous that was the eighth from Osymandias. Of Osymandias and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Aegypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not bene silent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Aegypt, vnto the reigne of Thuoris (who is generally taken to bee the same that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Aegyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to euery one the same length of reigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenchers, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Vchorous, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandias, from whom Vchorous is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Tamius (as Reineccius coniectures) was the great Osymandias; or else that this Acherres was Vchorous; for the distance betwene them was more then eight generations. Mercurius iudgeth Osymandias to haue been the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wifes; into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wifes right. As for Vchorous, Iosephus troubles not Mercurius to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdois, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Aegyptian name, belonging also to Vchorous, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex me with braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandias, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Aegyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Armie with the siege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Aegyptians said to denote the conquest of Babylonia made by that King: which how likely it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue been erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Aegypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his own particular monument, striming therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many statues, therein placed, by the Warres, the iudgement seat, the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuenues, and the plenty of all Cattell and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the severall Offices of a Governour. On the Tombe of Osymandias was this inscription. I am Osymandias King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him see some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceed his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay no further interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preferred among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the land of Canaan; and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-lived him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royal Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plenty of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Osymandias doth not hinder this coniecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his increase of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassas are called, that is, Great about the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, betwene the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eight in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I heereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his beeing Vchorous. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Geboar, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Eleasir, who hauing to his Masters vlt conquered Aegypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farre from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (conspicuously pronounced naming it El Cabira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Multitude, though he himselfe were a Dabnatiun slave.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Ramestes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beare his name.

WHEN Acherres had reigned eight yeeres, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fiftene yeeres; then reigned Armeus five yeeres, and after him Ramestes, thre score and eight. Of Armeus and Ramestes is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Aegyptus. For it is laid out that Danaus, being expelled out of Aegypt by his brother, fledde into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, he gaue in marriage to his brothers fiftie sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lyncus, and suffered him to cleape; finally, That for this fact, all the blondie sisters, when they died, were enioyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The reigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Ramestes, Aegyptus; is more then Reineccius beleueus: he rather takes Armeus to haue bene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great Lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can easily beleue, that he which fled out of Aegypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sinar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a reigne, as five yeeres, a worke of that labour could bee finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulcher and his wifes being some part, it is manifest that hee was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose reignes we haue no assurance, I may truly say, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Aegypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread, of Geboar, who founded Cairo; and of Sinar, who made the Countie Tributarie, were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their reignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and fiftie fadomes deepe. It serued to recieue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmfull to the Countie; and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Ruer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet oymments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the top their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon diuided, by inserting one Armeus (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeere and odd months of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Ramesses, his sonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortye yeares. Some giue him onely nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinkes him to haue bene the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already spoken in the first Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

Ethiops, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie five yeeres. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesostris. But the state of the world was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesostris made, could haue bene eyther easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now bene performed, as any man will perceiue, if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who liued with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynastie of the Larthes; which Renneccius coniectures to haue had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being illustration, whereinto the old Kings of Lydia, the Lydians out of Aegypt) and to haue signified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which these Kings were Generalls, I take to haue bene against the Athiopians: for first I am, that they troubled not the Countie of Palestina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they traueled ouer the desert sands, on the other hand: to seeke matter of conquest, in the poore Countie of Africa. But these Generalls (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five onely had that title; and the last of these tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from Antinimi, till the most vsureable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbeare the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appeares by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the government themselves; and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much vnto the Viceroyes. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends onely vpon coniecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though some few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For so wee finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Aegypt (after such time as the Soldane Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraignty to himselfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, stiled Eddagadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, spend of the Soldans Treasure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawne, whether from their Countie, as those of the Thebans and Diopolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many thinke, that the fourteenth Dynastie was called of the Shep-herds, because Ioseph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Ammius his Mandis) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generalls, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sesae, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now returne to the businesse which we left.

Ramesses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threecore and sixe yeeres. He is mistaken for that second Sesostris, of whom I haue spoken in the first booke. I find nothing worth rehearfall of this Ramesses, or of Amenophis and Annenemes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortye, the later sixe and twenty yeeres. Wherefore it may very well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thuris, the last of the Larthes, reigned onely seuen yeeres; yet is hee thought to haue bene that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he tooke Helen from Paris, and after the sacke of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I neede say no more in restitution of this, than that the time of Thuris his reigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder Officers: for such only are like to haue had their residence about Pharos, and the Sea-coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that hee could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Proverbe. The Poets stiled him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fishes, for belike hee was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fishing about the Ile of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinites, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleue what hee list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor thinke that either he, or his Father, did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Aegypt, according to Cedrenus, Of Vaphres and Sesae.

Any other names of Aegyptian Kings, are found scattered heere and there; as Thomapher, of whom Suidas deliueis onely the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepor, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Eucenes, noted by occasion of a great Physicion that liued vnder him; Bandyru, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great iustice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Ile of Thule, which some take to be Island; and that he consulted with the Deuill, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had bene; or after him should be so mighty as himselfe. The answer or confession of the Deuill was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plessis his worke, Of the transmigration of Christians religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one, which is this;

First God, and next The word, and then The Spirit,
Which three be One, and joyne in One all three:
Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence faine wight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me; in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some impoliture: but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discorde himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that hee was a man both deuout and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Aegyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first King of Aegypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriuing their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the son of Chus, was also called Orion, and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three sonnes, Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus, and Ninus. Picus chusing his father out of Affrya into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeeres, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Ninus, his sister and wife, and to Belus his sonne; after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeeres, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visit his olde father Saturne; Saturne forth-with resigned the Kingdome vnto him. Picus Iupiter reigned in Italie threecore and two yeeres, had threecore and tenne Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Ile of Crete.

Ecc

The

The Principall of Iupiters sonnes were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: he reigned in Italie, after his father, five and thirtie yeeres: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, he got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeeres. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, foure yeeres and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twentie yeeres and a halfe. There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus, and Thules, of whom we speake before: the length of their severall reignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesaitis King twenty yeeres. His successor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeeres, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharao, to averry long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have bene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon; and Sesac, the assister of Rehoboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These giue vs no length of his reigne; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princesse. In the list of Rehoboam all hath bene written that I finde of Sesac, excepting the length of his reigne, which must have bene fixe and twentie yeeres, if he were that Smendius with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sesac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall wee knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, King of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was slaine, I reckon vponwards the yeeres of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first yeere of Sesac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twentie fixe of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, than Iu the Israelite, & Craffus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill vp the time betwene Sesac and Neco, I haue rather taken those Kings that I finde in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Eusebius, we finde no Name nor Act recorded elswhere, save onely of Bocherus, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue bene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Aethiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esay, that the Counsellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, inasmuch, that they said of Pharao, I am the Sonne of the wife, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which ouerthrowes the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Iuda. For though it please him well to see how the reignes of Iasias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all; the reigne of Iasias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting, to compare the reignes of the Kings of Iuda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, King of Israel, is made to reigne three yeeres after Ahasia of Iuda; Samaris is taken by Salmassar before Hezekias was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeere of their collateralls than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI.

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betwene the times of Rehoboam and Iezekia.

Following therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chemis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fiftie yeeres, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramid hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome vponwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Bale of seuen akers enerie way, and was aboue fixe akers high. It was of a very hard and durance Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeeres, without complaining of any iniurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thousand yeeres, which doth giue the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers do testifie, that they haue seene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and inclining rather to the opinion, that his sonne Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue bene brethren; but the length of their reignes may argue the later to haue bene sonne to the former: for Cheops reigned fiftie yeeres; Cephrenes fiftie fixe. These were, as Chemmis had bene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had ouer-labored themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honor, and entituling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies: otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might be, that they, who had not power to auoid the like slauerie, laid vpon them by the younger brother or sonne, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting money, did prostitute her, and that she, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramid, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Asterinus, the sonne of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father fixe yeeres. He would haue built as his fore-goes did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of fixe yeeres onely, because of this his deuotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should haue bene afflicted in hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou liue but fixe yeeres. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countie impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was, doubtlesse, more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeere of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is that his reigne, and the reignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reculled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Diuell, than the restitution of Idolatrie durst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reineccius fiftie faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with monie, for hee sent Horfes and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede, for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca.) all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in fore distresse, till the sword of God, and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Nineue, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That he was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and their Country, that Sethon being Vulcan Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, &c. the like) marched towards Babylonia, and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did gnaw the bowes, quiers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (Scyth Herodotus) the statue of this King is set vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that holds me, serue God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how farre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their owne King, it may easily be perceiued. It seemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Iewes was then well knowne to the world, wherof euery childe could haue told, how much falsehood had beene mingled with the truth.

We finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he tooke his god now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue beene slaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stir vp the Egyptians to piety, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeede a very good motive to piety. But the Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that wee may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes (euery such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue beene ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Charets of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horsemens, because they were very strong; had it beene told them, that Sethon, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good lucke, or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoeuer it was, doubtlesse the propheticie of Esay tooke effect, which said, They shall be a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to haue beene set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus

Tarachus the Aethiopian, and therefore the twenty yeeres which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Sethon. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Aethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war last spoken of; the Aethiopians (as they are englished) ouer which he reigned, being indeede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Tirhaca, is placed in the reigne of Sethon, & therefore giue to Sethon the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Aethiopian (as he is called) began his Reigne ouer Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned, Funfilius peremptorily citing no author, nor alleading reason for it, sets him downe thirty three yeeres; many omit him quite, and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the reignes of these Egyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the fist of Reheboam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conserued vpon him whose length of reigne is vncertaine; that is, vpon this Sethon. By this account I finde the thirty three yeeres, that are set downe by Funfilius, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon his reigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeere lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Pamonicus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and wherinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasse and his Contemporaries.

The wickednesse of Manasses. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

Manasse, the Sonne of Ezekia, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, let vp repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Diuell was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himselfe esteemed the Sonne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Hoste of Heauen, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Diuell Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Diuels.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, hee shed so much innocent blood, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Silo to be sawne in sunder, with a wooden saw, in the eightieth yeere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent herof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and so good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captaines of the Hosts of the Kings of Athur, which tooke Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twenty yeeres as a captiue, and dispoyle of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall timall prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Affrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was againe established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him; he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuilish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long reigne of fiftie five yeeres: Glycas and Snidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Affrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleue as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Setchon. The reigne of Psammiticus.

THAT the wickednesse of King Manasse was the cause of the euill, [which fell] vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs beleue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous to enlarge his Empire, to make attempt vpon Juda. For the Kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissension, and after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betwene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betwene these, eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Egypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Setchon, betwene the reigne of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernours, immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Setchon.

The occasion of this dissension seemes to haue beene the vncertainty of title to that Kingdome (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraignty.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fiftene yeeres, in good seeming agreement, which to preferue, they made strait couenant and alliances one with another, being iealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke-offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vntic lasted, they ioynd together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neere vnto the Lake of Meris; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could giue it commendation, answerable to the flateliness of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnprefect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue bene the worke of Marus, or Memides, a King which liued five generations before Proteus, that is, before the Warre of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Memides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue bene Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus & Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, & others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Atisanes the Aethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had coniectured Manethons Amenophis, to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Setchon should be Atisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a coniecture; the times which we now handle are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amasis, Atisanes was Sabacus, and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Atisanes the Aethiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Aethiopian deposed Amasis; Atisanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing off nders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Atisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauiug Setchon, whom Diodore omits, as hauiug not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleueed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I haften to their end.

At a solemne feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cuppes. Here vpon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and there-with supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being iealous of their estate, they banished him into the marshy Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleue to haue bene none other: In the rest Herodotus & Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hyred Souldiers out of Caria and Ionis, by whose aide hee vanquish his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeeres of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeeres to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling, ioyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, hee that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to haue bene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernours, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreame age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threecore and nine yeeres. I therefore yeelde rather to Eusebius, but will not adventure to cut five yeeres from the Aristocratie: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeeres companion in that gouernment.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of these Egyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, betwene the fift of Rehobeam, and the fourth of Iehoskim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeere from Setchons reigne; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe, because Eusebius may haue followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe alleadgeth, in giuing to Setchon a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeere of one reigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, reigned precisely so many yeeres as are prescribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplied the defect of others. Wherefore I confound the last yeere of those fiftene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt, who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionis, and Arabia, to whom he gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Aethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought vp in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to finde out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his workes, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks vsed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not insit vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which he spent nine and twenty yeeres. Neuer haue we heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had bene won by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

MERE it certainly knowne, in what yeere of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained libertie; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to haue bene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God fo disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the ciuill warres in Egypt that followed vpon the death of Sethon, or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the warre betwene Psammiticus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make fire worke with the King of Juda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely waite it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned wit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Azotus, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargaine vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could afford) had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present aduantage ouer the Iewes, he might make his way the fairest into Egypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner, or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmino, who thinke that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twentieth seauenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was forty yeeres an Idolater, and liued fifteene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these coniectures is vpheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, as more vnp probable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleadged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before before he gaue his iudgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his sinnes, it is not like that he should haue continued, as he did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age; by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill hee was but fifteene yeeres from death. Touching the second; howfoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sinnes, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeeres, shall be punished with small impenitency. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse, than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did, is remembered at large, and his repentance vterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life; the story of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sinne that he sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said, Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this vnto Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sinnes of Manasses, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Ierusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier then fifteene yeeres before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seauen yeeres old; he repented, and becoming a new man, liued in the feare of God forty yeeres after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeeres of ciuill dissension in Egypt; fouretee or fifteene yeeres following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignty: the warre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twenty yeeres, of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his reigne (after the first fifteene yeeres) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto isthis; that the fifteenth of Manasses, was the last yeere of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seauen and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the sonne of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the yeere of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer-violently to mine owne computation.

This was the first great mastric that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmassar, yet Ezechias neuer paid it. True it is, that he hoped to stay senacheribs enterprize against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of siluer, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which couered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with greater necessity, could refuse no tolerable condition, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of seruitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his returne (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulassar, which had bene against all reason reason and policie, if it had not beene his duty by covenant. Of this I will speake more in conuenient place.

†. IIII.

Of the first and second Messenian warres, which were in the reignes of Ezekia, and Manasse, Kings of Iuda.

Now concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about the times of Mansses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Warres, which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, between the Troian and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Medean War began and ended in the days of Ezekia; the second in the reign of Manasse: but to avoid the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needless, than to say, that the potentitie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops and the Achaens out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedaemone, Argos, Medene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloody Wars; whereof the first Medean were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance; they too were so slight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedæmonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour, to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slain many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yielded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other side, excuse Polychares, for that he was growne franticke, through iniuries received from Emephes a Lacedæmonian. This Emephes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattails, and slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, lying, that they were stolen. Whilest the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive, he carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but hauing him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians hauing refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the iudgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counsaile of Greece, or to any other, faire course. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great desire to occupie the faire Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough, to haue some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old iniuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold warre with Messene, till they had mastered it: which done, they seized vpon Amphisa, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Massenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battle was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victory. The Atessenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedaemonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the second yeere of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twentie yeeres. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedaemonians waſting the inland parts of Meſſene; and the Meſſenians, the Sea-coaſt of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both ſides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Meſſene; the Spartans had, beſides many Subieſſes of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a ſecond, third, and fourth battaile, were fought, with as great obſtinacie as the firſt; ſauing that, in the fourth battaile; the Lacedaemonians, were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still vncertaine, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeeres were spent ere all this blood was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warreto linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountain with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authorstell vs, the Lacedemonians were so obdurate in this Warre, because of their vow, that hauing absented themselves ten yeeres from Sparta, their wiuces lent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpeopled, by reason that no children had bene borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent backe all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got to many of them with childe, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus relates the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Messenian Warre, when the Diuell in an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stocke of Aegyptus*, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedemonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciscus; Epibolus the Priest, willing to save her, said, she was onely a fostered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lyciscus; which answere giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Noble man, being in loue with the Maide when otherwise he could not procure, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had deflowered her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions; into desire of his preuailing against the Lacedemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Country, which he loued most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained in most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yeerely fruites of their Land they were bound to send vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiuces, to make solenne lamentations, at the death of eury Spartan; they were also sworne to lue in true subiection to the Lacedemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was giuen to the Asinai, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vncertaine termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeeres it continued (the Messenians not finding how to helpe themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able young men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedaemonians, and therefore learned to seruethful Matters, as had of old tyme, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of theke was Arifomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Apytus, who perceived the vniforme desires of his Countie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argines and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answereable to his purpose, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedaemon. This was in the fourth yeere of the three and twentieth Olympiad, when the Lacedaemonians, hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their Enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought betwene them, and a doubtfull, fauer that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Arifomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King; but hee, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeere another battaile was fought, wherunto each part came better provided. The Lacedaemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argines, Arcadians and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Arifomenes did so beaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedaemonians beganne to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement.

But one Tyrtaeus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-enforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him in hope to haue recovered the bootie.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vpon the Lacedemonians, through the treacian of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their princall Citie, all the townes in Messene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lacke of mento defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleauen yeeres. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. He waisted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattaille, and all provisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and household stuffe hee changed into money, suffering the owners to redeme them. To remedy this mischief the Lacedemonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adioyning parts of their owne Countrey, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtaeus appeased this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not onely ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surprised, and sacked Amycla, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner, yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembered, as a thing very strange and maruailous. He had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe natural Cauer into which the Spartans vsed to cast head-long, such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adiuiced. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fells; Aristomenes howeuer it came to passe) took no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead body. Here vpon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ran through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes deliue himselfe with his nails, that at last he cleaued out his passage. When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedemonians in the siege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken, then was it easily beleued, that Aristomenes was aliue indeede.

Thus eleauen yeeres passed whilest the enemies howering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asked him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a drake rainie night as this was. The slaue that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There he found Epuperamus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vetered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreame darkenesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindered all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight, one part being incited, by mere hope of ending a long worke; the other enraged by mere desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowness of the streets and other passages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toyle; their enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meate and sleepe, and then returning supplied the place of their wearie fellows, with fresh Companions. Aristomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (ashauing beene three dayes, and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedemonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to giue an open way, leaving a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Aristocrates their false-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste vnto Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne secure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the spoyle of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedemonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to ioyne with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedily aduertisement thereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent backe to Aristocrates, was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his trecherie, with a note: That the Perurser cannot deceiue God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his Son Gorgus and other sufficient Governours, who should plant them in some new state abroad, he resolved himselfe to make aboade in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally, Aristomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence he purposed to haue trauailed vnto Ardys the Sonne of Oger King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media; but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were invited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian), and went into Italie after the former warre) being Lord of the Rhezians in Italie, to take his part against the Zanclean in Sicilie, on the other side of the Streights. They did so, and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keepe to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeere of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home seruiced the Lacedemonians, found meanes to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedemonians, and then followed their ancient Countrymen into Italie and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselves a seate.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and foure score yeeres, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, & loue of their forsaken Countrey, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third yeere of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epanimondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedemonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epanimondas restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie; which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despite of the Lacedemonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

§ V.

Of the Kings that were in Iudith and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deiocrates the Medes were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Iudith. Of the historie of Iudith.

Ardys King of Iudith, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding vnto his father Ogyz, began his reigne of nine and fortie yeeres, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrey by the Scythians, ouerran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Iudith, but wan the Citie of Sardes; though the Castele or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held till for King Ardys; whose long reigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeere of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six yeeres after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last yeere of Manasses his reigne ouer Iudith.

Deiocrates the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these fine and fiftie yeers in which Manasses reigned. This Deiocrates was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to despise the whole some severity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deiocrates answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldom gave presence, which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and severely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betwene this King, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliueis, that Deiocrates was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Iudith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holophernes sent to worke wonders vpon Phud and Lad, and I know not what other Countreies. For I recken the last yeere of Deiocrates to haue bene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier in the time of Merodach Baladach, some later, in the reigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In

In fitting this booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much Labour bene spent with ill successe. The reignes of Cambyses, Darius Hyaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue bene sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue bene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Belshazzar, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot speake of such as faime would agree with him. Whilest Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iudith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue bene very favourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this History; and aboue all, the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose iudgement the authority of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Reigne of this vainglorious King. As for Schus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captiuitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Ioachim High Priest; and a long peace, of three score and ten yeeres or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Iewes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that reigned in Ninuite, eightene yeeres at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes, one whom the Medes refused to assise; one that sought to be generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Viccroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

All these circumstances; the Priesthood of Ioachim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and dissolution of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controversie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonically. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and rededified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly bene built by Deiocrates) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he addes, that from the twelfth yeere to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or sixe yeeres, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Gracian expedition (which he supposeth to haue bene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seeke to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Arme which he lent forth vnder Holophernes. So should the Iewes haue done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historie of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we shall neede to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away beliefe from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Arme consisting of fiftene hundred thousand men, should presume to stirre, vpon the strength of euere hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God then himselfe. It is indeede easie to finde enough that might be laid against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity, of holding the booke of Iudith, to be Canonically, I would rather chosse to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence vpon this ground, than by following the opinion of any other, to violate as he will doe, the text it selfe. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Belshazzar (whose works I haue not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath proued by many arguments: That he liued not in the Reigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath proued very substantially, shewing how the Cardinalls delusion, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chodonor, found out by Tornellus, are the children of meere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needs no prooffe at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a sportive field) have chased Holfernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Iudith. c. 2. ver. 23. & 25.

Surely, to finde out the borders of Iapheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holfernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologists. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; having already so farre digressed, in loggers. But I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Reigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first yeere of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeere the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Salvius chosen; a peaceable man and seeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good ciuilitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better then meere delusions that serued onely as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of theues and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, then their boy-sterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost sixe hundred yeeres after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being vterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of waxe; of his owne constitutions, senten, and other leauen of Philosophie. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to haue a sight of these Bookes, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senat, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquire himselfe vnto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not bene so foolish as to beleue the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when hee liue in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the miste of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generally) effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confusion, without remedy, of Idolatry that was intenerate.

Numa reigned three and fortie yeeres in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the sixe and fortith of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie yeeres, buied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Athenians, who met him in the fildes; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thracians, caused them to be thinke themselves of a counsell, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weake for a common enimie, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins borne at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Cosen Germans) of equal yeeres and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatij, Champions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curatij that fought for Alba (as Liuius tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equal speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, he slue them, as it had bene in single fight, man after man, ere they could ioine together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatij was slaine, then one of the Curatij, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatij, whom the third Horatius did cunningly feuer the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become subiect vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouvernour, vterly razed, the people being removed vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, wherein Alba, as the mother Citie, had bene chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not subiect vnto it, and diuers pettie States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundrie ages, and few of them remaekable considered apart by themselves) vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to be the maine subiect of this Historie.

The seuenth yeere of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Gouvernours for ten yeeres, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I finde onely names, Leocrates, Abxander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Gouvernours for ten yeeres, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, & from tearme of life reduced vnto ten yeeres, it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not onely professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeeres of the Greeks, how they did answer vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore hee placeth the building of Rome, in the first yeere of the seuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeere of Charops gouernment in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sett the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the Reigne of Manasses it was, that Midus, whom the Poets fained to haue had Asles eares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him; especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which hee should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to haue bene starued (his meat and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from this miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselfe in the Riuier Pactolus, the streame whereof hath euer since, forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said hee died by drinking Bulls blood; being inuaded by the Seythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obserued the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Ensebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtained some power by Sea, founded Maceratis a City on the East of Aegypt. Psammetichus herein seemes to haue assisted them, who vsed all means of drawing the Greekes into Aegypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Aegypt by force.

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime * Asiatu, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samua, according to Pausanias, lived much about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedamon, were conducted by Phalanus into Italie: where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iustine and Pausanias finde it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet living, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now Vrbini in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were vpbraided as blinde, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue beene done in the time and fiftie yeeres of Manasses: that which hath already beene told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Ierusalem.

§. I.

Of Ammon and Iosias.

Ammon the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after hee had reigned two yeeres. Philo, Eusebius, and Nicephorus giue him ten yeeres, following the Septuagint.

Iosias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a child of 8. yeres olde, he began to seek after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yere he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places, and the groues, & the carved and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stamped to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophecied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a childe should be borne vnto the house of Rudath, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (saide the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense vpon thee: a prophecy yet remarkable.

In the eleventh yere of his reigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which yere Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which hee shewd to the King: which when hee had caused to be read before him, and considered of the seuerer commandments therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and exasperation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, euen all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Iuda, because they haue forsaken mee, and burnt incense to other gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a louour of God and his Lawes, it was promised that this euill should not fall on Iuda and Ierusalem in his dayes, but that he himselfe should inherit his graue in peace.

Iosias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read vnto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and commandments in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the filse Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countreys, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vse the aduantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twenty yeeres) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his libertie, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Iuda had so long held with those of Aegypt, by casting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Iewes, which had beene lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Iuda, it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleue, that hee, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Aegyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such preparations, only for his mindes sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly termes, as required not onely a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requitall. For no pertuasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Neco King of Aegypt passed along by him, to waite vpon the Countreys about the Riuer of Euphrates.

The last yeere of Iosias his reigne it was, when Neco the sonne of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Armie towards the border of Iudea, determining to passe that way, being the nearest toward Euphrates, cyther to strengthen the passages of that Riuer, about Carchemish, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the trauaile of Psammiticus had not bene idly consumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Aegyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Assyrian Kings of Damasco.

Neither was the industrie of Neco lesse than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly haue auailed the Aegyptians, and aduanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valor of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Aegypt of it selfe could afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some dilabillie of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Aegypt, into the Countreys bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty Armie.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduising with himselfe to which of these hee might adhere, hauing his Territorie set in the mid-way betweene both, so as the one could not inuide the other; but that they must of necessity tread vpon the very face and bodie of his Countrey; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Ambassadors, leave leau to passe along by Iudea, protesting that hee directed himselfe against the Affyrans onely, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all succed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Aegypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Affyrans, and wholly trusted to Sabace, or Sais King of Aegypt, was vterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Affyrans so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and fourteenth yeeres of Ezekias, whilst that good King and his people relied vpon Setbon, and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Aegyptians, who (neere neighbors though they were) were alwaies vnready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might bee the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Tewes renew their ancient league with him, but onely craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime betwene him and the Affyrans. This was an easie thing to grant, seeing that the countenance of such an Armie, as did, sooner after this, out-face Nabulassar vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Tewes, a Lawfull excuse of feare, had they forbore to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by politike respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselfe bound in faith & honor, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Iuda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Aegyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie the Prophet, which I doe not finde in the Prophecies of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleue. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to aske the counsell of God: and this is very like; seeing hee might beleue that an enterprize grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauing all the strength he could make, neere vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco; and there hee receiued the stroke of death, which longed about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Iuda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his booke of Lamentations.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Iosias: Of Ichoihaz and Ichoiakim Kings of Israel.

Of these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should haue reached about an hundred miles in length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to rowe in front. But in the middle of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toylesome businesse twelue hundred thousand Aegyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leaued a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the seruice, as well of his Nauie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, save onely this victorie against Iosias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolis, and the Tewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudea was a Province of Syria, and Magdolis or Magdala is taken to haue bene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Neco tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Particularly we finde, that the Phenicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, Herod. l. 4. were his Subiects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting faile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whercon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustentance; in that long voyage which lasted three yeeres. This was the first Nauigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered, which after was forgotten, vntill Vasco de Gama the Portugall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars & streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gibraltar, hauing Africke still on the right hand: but the Portugals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same streights, leaued Africke on the Larboard, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not beleue, how the Sun in this iourne was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessarie truth, and the obseruation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleue, that such a Voyage was indeed performed.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Aegyptians were busie at Carchemish, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Reigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Iehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Iosias: Wherefore it may seeme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel, the rest of his house being more inclined to the Aegyptian, as appears by the sequel. An Idollater he was, and thrined accordingly. For whenas Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudea. This Countie was now so farre from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter wen so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Aegypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may be observed in diuers examples. Yet heere Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, since hee could no better vse it. But howeuer Iehoiakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributary, without any stroke stricken, which three months before was too stout to giue him peace, when hee deuided it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waste his forces vpon Iudea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Carchemish, together with the diffention of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue formed at the preferment of his younger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Tewes had suffered much, in the Aegyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen of necessity to forsake that partie, and to ioyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people as would not vpon euery occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheless hee laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of siluer, and one Talent of gold; that so hee might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leau vnto them some document in the future, of greater so dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrey, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldaean and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times; of which Booke whosoeuer was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Storie of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nabum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine teame, yet it appears to haue taken effect, in the finall destruction of Ninive by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Agypt, foregoing to this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authoritie then the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to asseme, that about these times, Ninive was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Merodach: a needlesse coniecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach, did seize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Countrey of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought our readie to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Ninivites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so much alluaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeeres.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue shewed what impediment was giuen by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Aegyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countreys adiacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble dounded euen to the Aegyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing, with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them, for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should eather seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, inciting him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to be too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeeres, he saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrey from them. Yet hee reports a warre betwene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Ninive; the siege of Ninive being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountered in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Agypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, be true, though not in such order of time, as hee hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his fortie yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammitis the sonne of Phrao Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammitis may, by some strained coniecture, be thought to haue bene he that met with the Scythians: for hee liued with with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palestina, to Psammiticus the Father of Neco, whom hee leaues dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to beleue him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neere to vniformitie.

I haue noted before, that in the Reigne of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouerran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to finde the eight and twentie yeeres, wherein the Scythians reigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Aegyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeeres compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaues the space very scant, eather for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Aegyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue receiued ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Reigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that hee should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Aegyptians and Tewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne; to a more mighty Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appears to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Armie, but were the defeatures of some troopes, that infected their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northern Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reigne, in compass whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iourne.

TOUCHING the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tells vs, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Countrey by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remoued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Agypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Heereby wee may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as malicious and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countreymen, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had bene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ranackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well knowne, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose reflow did ouerwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we doe now treat. Hee that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified; which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken; of all Goropius his workes, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There wee finde it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrey whether he placeth in the West, as neere vnto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being faire from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darknesse; certaine it is that he would haue them neere neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrell to them, which Herodotus had; and therefore belike would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his workes the names of such as liued in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to him- selfe deserued. And for this reason it is proued by Eustathius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Countrey. Perhaps that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerij (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it bee not in expresse termes written, that they did with ioynt-forces, yet seeing they inuaded the selfe-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourney of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue bene wiues of the Scythians, and no lesse Warre-like than their Husbands; alleading the example of that Queene who is said to haue slaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wiues along with them to the Warres; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew them, giues prooffe sufficient. I will not heere enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will giue mee better leisure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuers Historians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Gorepius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neere allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to haue bene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seate, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this iourne. For the Citie of Nowograd in Russia (which Countrey is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way home-wards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruell though many Countreies felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred yeres and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie about three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer many Countreies, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to haue settled themselves in Italie, they diuided their Companie, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Mere necessity enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Countrey, being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and thus vp on the North side with intollerable cold, which denied issue that way to their ouer-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of possession, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gaue them great aduantage ouer such as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not bee without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they preuailed verie farre; their next neighbours giuing them free passage, that they might the sooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places, others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

The first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had full on the right hand; leaving on the other side, and behinde them, the great Mountaines of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Cholebis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrey of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whereon Sinope, a famous Harbor. lib. 4.
 bour Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vseruiceable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages, vnder some good gard: as drawing neere to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri of whom (spake euen now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neere vnto Gaule, vpon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Tonia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines, or any deepe Riuer at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halyx they had already passed.

What battells were fought between these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable success the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor am able to coniecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardis, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardis the capitall Citie of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardis Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halyattes and Crasus in the times following; all that Ardis did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Milefians Corne fields, that was done in twelue yeres by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands full of this businesse, that hee could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing wortheie of remembrance in those wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of warre are neuer so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seates, labour to root out the established possessions of another Land, making room for themselves, their wiues and children. They that fight for the masterie, are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements, which had they bene yielded at the first, all had bene quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse earne of this couragious arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their liues without redemption. Most of the Countreies in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witness the diuersitie of Conquests; hauing by the happy victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill Arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Countrey, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible crueltie, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive vnto. So that by considering the process of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vtter enmitie, had bred such acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one mild temper, no small number of the Dames became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victorie of Halyattes may haue hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seemes to haue done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde heereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded betweene the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the Riuer of Halys should diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the Riuer was the Countrie of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughteris these warlike women are supposed to haue bene.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing, betweene Halyattes and Cyxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Median sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should haue ioyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safetie: though otherwife it had bene dangerous to Halyattes, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre betweene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and lesse probabilitye. He tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Countrie by faction, came vnto Cyxares; who committed vnto them certayne Boyes, to bee instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians viling much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neuertheless other-whiles misse of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuled them; and they, as impatient as hee, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented vnto him; which done, they fledde vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliues, as the ground of a Warre that lasted fixe yeeres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particuliarly they had reason to distrust Cyxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countrie men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that we should speake.

†. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

As the Cimmerians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and hauing the Caspian Seazon their left hand, passed betweene it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psanmiticus reigned in Agypt. If it were in the sixth yeere of Nabulassars Reigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to haue reigned fixe and thirte; otherwife we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeeres of their Dominion end, one yere before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giuing him good leaue to provide securely, for the invasion of Syria, which expedition hee began while his Father yet liued, as Iosephus out of Berosus relates the Historie.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to vnder-

goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remoue these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Agypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neere enough; whither if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But it is well known, that his Dominions lay in the middelt betweene Media and Agypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may very well beleue, that they watered their horses in his Riuers, and that he also was content to giue them prouender.

Psanmiticus hearing of their progresse (like the iecalous Husband of a faire Wife) took care that they might not looke vpon Agypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily deaime them there, than any force or perswasion, that he could vse, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Arme that should keepe them backe. Agypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not bene ill spent in suauing all. Yet Psanmiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had bene so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina; whence he neuer aduanced to meete with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to feede as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psanmiticus had put his backe a vast wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill haue endured to pursue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: especially the Kingdome of Agypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie iourney. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that he preserved his owne Estate from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Armeto depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the processe of his warres in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than euer troubled themselves with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seeke no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to seece the Naturals with gricuous exactions, they presumed to liue at discretion vpon the Countrie, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were) to saue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Countrie lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at once, leaving few aliue, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heaviest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrie not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better then a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay vnmunured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to proue what might be done by stratagem.

stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunke, and slew them, recouering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countreymen, with greater cruelty than euer they had practised before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloody feast, made any stirre in Media, I doe not finde; neither doe I reade that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by insuasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media, was very strong, and encountred with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found to abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Countrey, tooke good effect, with lesse blood-shed than hath beene supposed. For if he surprisid all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twenty yeeres had so well settled themselves, that they were desirous of lesse in eight and twenty yeeres, might goe ioyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seek their fortunes in other Prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the families of the North are said to haue beene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderstood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subiect vnto Nabuchadnezzar; mens loue of their wealth being most effectually, in taming the more vnquiet houle of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, so in his last beginning of warre, did beate the Aegyptians, who in ages foregoing had bene accustomed to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new successe of the King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Of the Scythian Armie returning out of Media, diuers Authors report a Storie, which continues me in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new lease, and establishing their plantation. For these had lost their wives by himde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaues. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of slaues, which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tells vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needs be: that they were very Boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleene that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set downe as I finde it in Master Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They vnderstood by the way, that their Claypey or Bond-slaues whom they left at home had in their absence possessed their Townes, Lands, Houses, Wiues, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining to villaine of their seruants, they made the more speede home: and so not farre from Nonograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon raising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set vpon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whites (which as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their foule condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onset: which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Driners. In memorie of this victorie, the Nonogradians euer since haue stamped their Coine (which they call a Dinget, Nonogradskoy, current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Countrey, haue fired the world euer since, in regard of their vnuerfall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscouite Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subiection; being well well assured to feele it often on her owne loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians; or rather Sarmatians (for Nonograd stands in the Countrey that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their Wiues; which after this, I finde not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Scythian expedition, not onely because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countreys; but for that it appears to haue bene a great cause, of the Aegyptians preuailling hitherto in Syria, and about Iudas, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

§ V.

Of Princes living in diuers Countreys, in these ages.

¶ Auing thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Aegyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much as I thought needefull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeere of Iulius; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twenty yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeere of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedemonians, bethinking them how to beaueged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre, entred their Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phisalia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeeres, leauing for successeur his sonne Periander, one of the seauen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisdom of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Countrey.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Ionians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blood: for he rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuento Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very milde. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless she were when she was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, unless it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe vp in immodest brauery, unless it were to inuigile a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would feeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustitie, that when his owne son had committed adulterie, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the yong man (who also lost one) from vtter blindness.

I shall not henceforth neede, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soone fall vnder the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successiue present themselves, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befall them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirtie hundred yeeres, which passed betwene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, wee finde little matter wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neere borders. Yet reade we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neere distance; all which must haue bene quite omitted, or else referred vnto a very vnreasonable rehearfall, had they not bene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Iudas, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to returne to the Iewish Storie, from whence we haue so farre digressed. In the third yeere of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, married Iudas with a great Armie, who besieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despite of Necho, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. All he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them thoroughly; for Necho hastened to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonosor in Iudas: where in this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armie, it being a Countrey of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Armie; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrey, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome; before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Aegyptian was not ready to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeere came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this yeere the Babylonian lying vpon the Bankes of Euphrates, his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-side, attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolute contention for victory, Necho was slaine, and his Armie remaining forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victorie Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Aegyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Aegyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Aegyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldean the yeere before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reservednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Aegyptian King Psammis, who succeeded vnto Necho, began to thinke vpon restoring Iehobaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp, as a Domestickall Enemie, against his vngratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Iudean had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for hee had made his owne sonne Iechonias King with him long before, in the second yeere of his owne Reigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeeres old. As for this rumour of Iehobaz his returne; the Prophet Ieremie foretold, that it should proue idle, saying: he shall not returne thither, but he shall dye in the place whither they haue led him captiue, and shall see this Land no more. The Aegyptians indeede, hauing spent all their Mercenary forces, and receiued that heauie blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe Steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammis Aries who reining after Psammis, did once adventure shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge booke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with braue words, telling such frivollous tales, as men that meane to doe nothing, vse of their glorious acts fore-past, against Iostas and Iehobaz. In this case it was, that Iehoiakim to giue them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand the sincerity of his affection to worke them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Iehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudean lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeldeto doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So hee continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three yeeres. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out against the Iewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeeres exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seauenty yeeres. The same calamitie he threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Aegyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his furie, whom they had forsaken and after the seauenty yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same cup, and be vterly subuerted by the Medes, and the Indians permitted to returne againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Ieremie seemes to haue bene in the fourth yeere of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King; but fearing the Kings furie, they had first let Ieremie at liberty, and acquied him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceiued the ill newes therein deliuered, made no more ado, but did cut the Booke in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Ieremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead body of Iehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and there should be none of his seede to sit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Aegyptian, the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon iust confidence of her owne strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the tearme of seauenty yeeres was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, & other Townes and Countreys; it is apparent, that they which refer the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, haue sure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it follows of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seauenth of his Reigne, as hauing lasted thirteene yeeres.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a brieffe note, concerning the seuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third yeere of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him vnto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same yeere. The yeere next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the first of Nebuchadnessar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Agypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I finde, of long disputations; but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seauenth of his Reigne.

The Citie of Tyre couered all the ground of an Island, that was diuided from the maine, by a deepe and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vse them, excelled all other Nations; and euery winde, from one part or other, brought needefull provisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheless the iudgements of God (denounced against it by Esaie, Ieremie, Ezechiel, &c.) had threatened the destruction, and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vnderooke a vast piece of worke, euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citie of old Tyrrus, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus neere adioyning that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeeres were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remainyng of Nabuchodonosors Peere, and being

Ier. 22. 11. &c.

Esaie. 40. 5. &c.

being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seauen moneths ere he could make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that where- with Alexander laboured to couer a shclue, with much more violence could it ouertume, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe, straining as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, where- as the Atacedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, either miracle, or force of his more immediate weapons, as may Earth- quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concu- rence of al second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man; euen the hand of man struuing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue ouer till he was master of the Towne.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losses receiued, some murine in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iosephus reports) some glorious rumours of the Aegyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iehoiakim re- nounced his subiection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fellow. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt; but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudaea; where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Aegyptians hauing left him, as it were in a dream) that he entred Ierusalem, and layed hands on Iehoiakim: whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing coun- sell, he caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulcher of an Asse, to be deuoured by beasts and rauenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iehoiakim or Iechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonosor remoued, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardocheus, and Ie- sedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his seruants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captiues. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no re- sistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he there- by auoided. This onely particular of his is recorded, which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserue his Estate: for so we reade in generall words, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Muthania his Vncle in the King- dome of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Justice of God. For like as Neco, King of Agypt, had formerly displaced Iehoiabaz, after his Father Iosias was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim, the sonne of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slue Iehoiakim, who depended on the Aegyptians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehoiabaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Agypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedi- ence, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witness in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Ieremie law and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judaans that were carried away captiue, the other those that stayed, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Booke or scroll he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to binde it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iour- ney of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue beene in way of visitation, car- rying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vni- quet conflicts, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appoint-appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own necke, others he sent vnto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came: to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they & the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their owne Countreies; if not, they should assuredly perill by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also fore-told them, that those Vessels, which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also traualle after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeere Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine which Ie- remie wore, in signe of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeeres, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Ieremie in stead of his wooden Yoke wore a Coller of yron: and in signe that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second month. After this, when Zedechias had vaunted long enough betwene Faith and Puffin, in the eight yeere of his Reigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours, the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrans, and others that were promised great aides of the Aegyptians: in confidence of whose resi- stance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Ieremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe: but being confi- dent of the helpe from Agypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Pro- phets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Iuda should be extirpate, vntill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Iacob) he despised the words of Ieremie, Gen. 49. 10. and imprisoned him. For Ieremie had told the King that the Citie should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken Prisoner, and brought to the pre- sence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perill by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Ierusalem, being the following yeere, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Agypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Ieremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) en- tered the border of Iuda, with his Armie, to succour Zedechias, of whose reuolt he had bene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue any trust in the succours of Agypt: for he assured them, that they should re- turne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans remoued from Ierusalem to encounter the Aegyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Agypt, as if they had already done enough; leauing the poore people of Ierusalem to their deplined miseries.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremity, had manumitted their He- brew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yeere of Abile) and made them free, there- by the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chalde- an Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had bene at an end, held them perforce to their former slauerie. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ierusalem began now to grow to extremitie, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safetie of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and periturie, had prouid- ed for him.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosephus eighteene; the Babylonian Armie lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam tur- res lignae per circuitum: They surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the be- sieged could neither fallly out, nor receiue into the Citie any supply of men or vi- ctuals. Iosephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towers raised vpon mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like vnto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betwene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, hauing once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the account from Nabonissar, left surer marks, and more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discover the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progress of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor policie remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the Historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metalls, discovered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did reigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needefull, to insilt vpon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeere of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Nimus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out: the succession of Belochus and his issue th it occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the yeeres of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye vpon. Let it therefore suffice, that the confusure and harmonic, which some haue found in the yeeres of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preferue their names, which otherwise might haue bene forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoeuer it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we onely learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeere his reigne began or ended, were it not that the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekias. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discover the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Iuda, which ended when 70. yeeres were expired; and these 70. yeeres tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords vs meanes of looking backe into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeere of Cyrus his reigne in Persia, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first yeere of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twentie yeeres before his Monarchie, and seauen yeeres afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeeres vnto the distance betwene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus, we may easily arrive vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of well-approved faith and industrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are markes whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeeres of the world, through any storie, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truely of the 70. yeeres, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

§. II.

Abrisef rehearfall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an answer to the cauits of Porphyrie, inuicizing against S. Matthew, and Daniel, vpon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, & Chronologers finde, that the captiuitie then began, when Iechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, cleauen yeeres before the final destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine distinction betwene the beginning of the Captiuitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzardan, in these words: In the sixe and twentieth yeere of our being in captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth yeere after that the Citie was smitten. In which words he beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, cleauen yeeres before the Citie was destroyed. Berosus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Ioskim, which he endeouours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but suffice not to make good so much as Berosus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue mislaid occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderstanding how the sonnes of King Iosias were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken hee knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming that these prophecies and villainous remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neere the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This second supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the seaventy Interpreters, who converted the old Testament about an hundred yeeres before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greece, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived diuers yeeres before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest thrust that great Conqueror, when he came towards Ierusalem to have destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded vnto him, which not onely stayed his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

It is true indeede that the Iewes themselves giue lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accompanying his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say *Esdra*s and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I may say so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by *Esdra*s and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimonie of Councils, and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea held about the yeere of our Lord 368. after the death of Junianus the Emperour, and after the Nicene Council three and forty yeeres, this booke of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonically Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Council it may be seen, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall history, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonically bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa bookes or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Psalms, Proverbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Heister, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not *Esdra*s, that wrote this booke, Gods commandment vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vnauerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other proofe, our Saviour Christ who cited no Apocryphall Scripture, in Mattheu and Marke alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

§. III.

That the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be numbered from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of Iechonia.

Having thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeeres. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuied by Beraaldus; but will forth-wich enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasse; then Iehoiakim; and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeeres is referred by none that I haue read, to the second, by few and with weak proofe; to the third, by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vith these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel. I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophetic out of circumstances, when the prophetic is such as doth sufficiently expound itselfe. Ieremie had already, in the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the finnes and impietie of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezar, the King of Babel, my servant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladnesse, the voyce of the bridegrome, and the voyce of the Bride, the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the King of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here we see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophetic was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophetic, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeeres at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the Historie of Iuda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried be away to Babel, and they were servants to him and to his sonnes, until the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Ieremie, until the Land had her fill of her Subbath: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the eighth yeere of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Ieremie, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. Weeeldome find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophetic, to haue afterwards bene the subiect of alteration. For one can hardly deuide, how cyther the desolation could haue bene expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the content of the prophetic haue bene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proofe in so euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this expedition of *Ieremie*s prophetic, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeeres. For in the first yeere of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had bene promised by prayer, which hee made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first yeere of his reigne, I Daniel vnderstood by books the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord hath spoken vnto Ieremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that howsoeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie be reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeeres of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Countrey, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, begonne in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of seuentie yeeres.

This I will not further seeke to prooue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which already hath bene produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

Sundrie opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. yeeres.

WHAT Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seuentie yeeres of the captiuitie, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, to may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Maiestie, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie piece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning vnto it the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peere of earth, and other matter, the reputation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders workes; in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach neerer to the enemie than their bowes would carrie, but were ready to turn their backs, as soone as anie, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to bee recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigne of their severall Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine bene taken in this businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeeres, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three foolish Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Aegyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue trauelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeeres, not onely by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the yeeres of their severall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Eulmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they onely the silence of Daniel, who names none other to betwixt warrant, but the prophetic of Jeremie precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, until the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great King shall serue themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde no other necessity of qualification to be vsed herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vnjust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and vninsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but only set downe

some Author of equall credit with the rest, might very well haue found and deferred as good beliefe, as any of those things which they haue deliuered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, deriue that Empire, as by descent from father to son, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeeres; to Eulmerodach 18. to Niglifar the sonne of Eulmerodach 40. to Labasardach the sonne of Niglifar 9. moneths, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (saue that he forbears to reckon the yeeres, and plainly calls Balthasar the sonne of Labasardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berosus and Iosephus as a sectator of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus as he is cited by Iosephus, report the matter faue otherwise. For hee tells vs that Eulmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did rei. ne but two yeeres, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband Nizi, Isidorus, who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeeres, and left it to his own sonne Labasardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nobonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeeres. This relation agrees with that of Iosephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number yeaeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authority, so that the names which they haue inferred, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Eulmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleue Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate successor to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betwene him that tooke Ierusalem, and Eulmerodach; another Nabuchodonosor: plaine enough it is that he hath, out of any Historie sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius Severus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Eulmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Eulmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremie before cited, proues that Balthasar was not the sonne indeed, but the grand-child of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the sonne.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very tightly the seuentie yeeres of captiuitie, giuing to Nabuchodonosor 45. yeeres, to Eulmerodach 30. yeeres, and to the three sonnes of Eulmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonosor fourteene yeeres; that is, to Reg-Assir the eldest son three yeeres, to Lab-Assir the second sonne fixe yeeres, and to Balthasar the third sonne fixe.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of yeeres, and in the number of generations, I haue sometime subscribed, as not daring to receiue an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserue to be regarded, haue consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might giue any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthasar, by Annius his Metasthenes, was faire short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeeres he pleased amongst the rest. For in the third yeere of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when he rose vp, he did the Kings businesse: from which businesse, that he did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his insufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when hee came into his presence, whether hee were for fixe and twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other: § and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of 8 than stands for 2. than hath 7 which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes 8 5. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in 85 standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical figures now in vs, they were long after the time of Nabuchodonosor brought in by the Arabians, and therefore not appertaining vnto this businesse; vnlesse wee should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Jeremie and Daniel, when they seeme to bee his opposites.

§. VII.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained betweene the destruction of Ierusalem, and conquest of Aegypt.

Ith what actions this time of 70. yeeres was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peraduenture haue been some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people euen their being. For euery Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hears could haue desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisdom greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restless nauell of purchasing: Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and strongers yeeres hauing beene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthe labours past. The nineteenth yeere of his reigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, hee, vntill his three and twentieth yeere, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had expoted vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Aegyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-armie, and whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither danted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obdurate resolution of this mighty Prince, employing all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyris did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemy) appears by the words which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voyce of Tyris: Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me; for seeing thee is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, euen in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his, whereof we haue already spoken, began to appeare about the waters, and threaten them with inuincible mischief.

But those prophecies of Jeremie and of Esay, which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeeres, that was prescribed vnto the reigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly plainly shew, that hee followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vtterly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiving the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fledde into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuertheless it seemes that this euasion serued only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excellent labour, the Affirian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serue a great service against Tyris, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of hauing destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had bene held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor vsed the aduantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Aegypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it bene poorer, yet either it must haue bene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue bene established. Neuertheless it was needfull, that before hee entered into this businesse, the Counties adiacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his deuotion, or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And heerein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adioyning Regions; whom God for their sinnes had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian words, were such, as regarding onely their owne gaine, had some of them, like Raucens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feed vpon the carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking aduantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Affirian had satisfied his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particulerly the Edomites and Philistines had shewed much malice to the Temes when their Citie was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue bene with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and tooke possession, as if not the Affirians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the blood of Iuda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Countie the people that abode in Michab, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did execute; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of raising, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost cunning of their cheeuish wits. But Nabuchodonosor did not consider all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine waite, ouer whoming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Isaiah, and Ezechiel, who fore-told, with little difference of words, the greathie and swift fall of the miserie that should come vpon them. With which of them hee had begun, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which fell his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Esay, threatening Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as hauing reference to the third yeere following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeere after it being spent in the Aegyptian expedition.

of Aegypt, whom Amasis tooke prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: doth not argue that he was a forrainer, and one that armed himselfe against the Aegyptian, withing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious then any way needfull, to vse all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to haue kept him aliuie, doth intimate that hee was some forren Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yeelded, though it had stood vpon the great apparance of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leaue the circumstances, prouing the Conquest of Aegypt by Nabuchadnezzar, to be obserued, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

How Aegypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall Historie of the Word hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preferred the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Aegypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are either in a manner utterly lost; but that the victorie was easie and swift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Aegypt by the well defended situation of his Countrey, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than wearie the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Aegyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great riuer of Nilus would afford vnto themselves, did little auaille them in prouision for the war, and much astonish them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vually scene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helps faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Aegypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand yeere hundred and foure score yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recouer by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it was neuer dreadfull vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shal no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vnto, The Riuer is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Aegypt now became fooles, the riuer failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Lewes whom he found in that Countrie. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away thence vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three and twentieth yeere of Nebuchadnezzar, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to haue bene at the returne from this Aegyptian expedition. But whi reas Iosephus tels vs, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we must vnderstand, that he was only a Viceroy, and not (as some haue militantly) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inueniencence, imagine that there were two successiue bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life and kingdom by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the D:putie of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phoenicians, who were before the Aegyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Aegypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Aegyptian name; vntill we should thinke that he had bene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but fruituous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleue, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Aegypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may guesse; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authority of Iosephus; that this Governour (or some successor of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probabilitie enough to perswade my selfe, and yet am well content, that others vse their liberty, and beleue what they list. As for the armie which this Aegyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garions of mercenary fouldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, & custody of the new subdued Prouince: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greeke Historians, depopled and slew Apries, I take them to haue bene the Aegyptian fugitiues, which then recouered their owne Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeeres will I gather the Aegyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Aegypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Aegyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they desired matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countreys disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accompts drawne from sundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Ninive, by him; the time of which action is vncertaine.

IF these victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars reigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument. Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeere of Leuiakins reigne (which ran along with some part of Nebuchadnezzars first yeere) and was kept in diet three yeeres more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzars Kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great Image, foretelling the successe of Monarchie, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set yeeres; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tels, that Aegypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophesy in the seauen and twentieth yeere; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeeres held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nebuchad-

Nebuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.

Nahum. 3. 8.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Aegypt, I doe not reade: excepting that against Ninuiæ, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Ninuiæ had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath bene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldeans Iehoiakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Inda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Ninuiæ followed the Conquest of Aegypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betwene this Citie, that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Aegypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzars reigne; the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which began at the end of the Aegyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betwene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very yeeres of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiosities of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Thizab Queen of Ninuiæ was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the later time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

Diu. 4. 17.

Of the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no Monuments extant; save those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiestie? Surely if those things betwene that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Mazabenes, he might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall, that besides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue bene reared, and finished in fiftene dayes.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider: his ouer-valuing of his owne greatness: abused him vnto a condition, inferior to the poorest of men. And not vnderstandedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approued the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that he cauled a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vnto them repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hercof S. Hierome hath well noted; Velox obliuio veritatis, ut qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statum sibi fieri iubeat, ut ipse quasi Deus in statu adoraretur: A hostile forgetfulness of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the seruant of God, as if he had bene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped, as God. From this impietie it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuiery of those blessed Saints out of the fierie furnace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted by an Angell; preferred from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands, and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his lastie zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduised him to breake off his sinne by righteousness, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Herby it seemes that iniustice and cruelty were the faults, for which he was threatened, but this threatening sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men, (according to the tenor of the dreame & interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to cattegrasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeeres leasure to repent was giuen to this haughtie Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so ouer-joyed and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced against him, he vttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiefticall workes which he had reared, as well becomming his maiefticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a iust measure) excepting onely this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of Dauid: for other (and some very godly) Kings haue mustred all their forces to the very last man, but few or none haue bene knowne to haue bene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not onely hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulness to entertaine them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightness of eternall felicity; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueh of his owne worth, doth aboute all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightning, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatness, forgetting the whilst him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these malamentis gaudia: The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorowes, cares, and feares: not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlikely token of vengeance nere at hand, when these vnreasonable stufhes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue bene humbled with a iust repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexpected. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seauen yeeres he liued, not onely as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast, for a beast he thought himselfe, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himselfe in the same manner; and with the same foode that beasts doe. Not that he was changed in figure externall, according to Medians, in so much as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was he changed as Phibida the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monster, as Dorothea and Epiphanius obtained; but according to S. Hieromes exposition of these words: At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me, &c. Quando diuinitas (saith S. Hierome) sensum sibi redditum ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem: When he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, he sheweth that he had not lost his humane shape, but his understanding. Seaven yeeres expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and exalting being; that he was the Lord of heaven and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his words were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyræ, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Isay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthazar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon jointly.

§. XII.
Of Euilmerodach.

Having already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadne- zars posteritic; the most that may be said of him, is said of Eulmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He left some part of that which his Father had gotten, and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He left Aegypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeere of his reigne, which was forty yeeres after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure and forty yeeres of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him fife and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yeere of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Aegypt. There were indeede but fouen and thirtie yeeres, which passed betwene the second yeere of the foure and fiftith Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Eulmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his reigne, wherein he was Aegypt, of which fouen and thirtie yeeres it is credibly held, that Plamennius, the sonne of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeeres. But seeing that these two Greek Historians haue bene abused by Aegyptian Priests, in the fustance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruell though they were also deceived in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and forty set down in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Alyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Aegypt, vntill the nineteenth of Eulmerodach (which time, and not before, it hath bene proued out of Ezechiel, that Aegypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

gaine a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Assyrians troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Eutimerodach as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some force reccieined by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldned the Assyrians to rebell against him; I will neither undertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tells, that the first service of young Cyrus in warre, was under Aspases King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a proleptous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteene or sixteene yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus lived threecore and three yeeres (as he is said to have died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinary terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Eutimerodach his reigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances inflaming as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage vnto those that he had left him, to stand vpon prouder teames with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst haue vsed. Howsoeuer the quarrell began, we finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For that Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew vnto his partie the Egyptians; and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to ouerwhelme his enemies with a strong inuasion, whom in vaine hee had fought to weare out with a lingering Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Amyages, who left the World in the nineteenth yeere of Eusimerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Aegypt. So that the African hauing his hands, already full of bufileine, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to haue giuen the better means vnto the Aegyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the far more mightie Perfian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Eulmero and ach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeeres before uttered against Babel, by Efay and Ieremie.

10 For the Affyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Perfians vnder their thicke throwes of arrowes and darts, were encountered with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weighly armed for close fight, by whom they were beate[n] in open battell, wherein Eulmador-dach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Abuchodonosor had raised and vp-held, being shaken and grievously crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to be sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

¹⁰ Aprinate coniecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berofus, concerning the Successors of Euilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The qualitie and death of Balthazar.

Hough I haue already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proued that Balthazar was the Sonne, and immediate Successour to Eulmiredach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Niglissar, or Ningissaroor, and his sonne Labassardach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon; who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie: I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some errorr might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needeflesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obserue, that the time which Berosus diuides betwixt Eulmiredach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeeres in which Nebuchadnessar liued wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddaincense of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that State, wherein doubletise the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that claufe which promised his recovery, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for settling the gouernement, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Eulmiredach being to supply the vtter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Proteftors doe the vnriseiue of in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the infolenencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small ability of gouernment, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris was his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vilefull workes about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Affyrians, and amongst them Ninuiie. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgouernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leaue it vnto her vngenerous sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue reigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niglissar, who got the Kingdome from Eulmiredach, was his sisters husband.

husband; which argues this to haue bene the same woman. As for Labaffardach the son of Nighlar, at the end of nine Moneths reign he were for his lowd conditions flaine by the Nobilitie, as the fame Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezars restitution (whose tearme of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vye many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Euimerodach, telling vs that he was flaine by his sisters husband: for the plain words of the Scripture, named the yeere wherein he gaue liberty to zechonia, doe plainly tellifie that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth yeere of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Enlilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when he held it in his owne right. Of Balthazar, who was his Sonne & Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his young yeeres of a mischieuous nature, hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his siter, onely for spight and enuie to see him kill two wilde beasts in hunting, at which himselfe hauing throwne his Iaueline had misted them. Another great Lord he had gekled, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous vilians caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him, vnto the enemies: soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of reuerence, but as a Coward and a Foole he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him: Yet causeliesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable feynety, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision; which had shewed his ruine not in many houres before, euen whilst he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reigne of seauenteene yeeres, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath bene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose storie that of Balthazar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuerſion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Babylonia, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Medus its self.

L of Media it selfe.
Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metaithenes. These two Princiall Gouvernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, diuided betwene them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar, the Dominions awfell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud reigning in Perſia, formerly

formerly been dependants on the Aedes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achemenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Japhet; that they had Kings soone after the flood, Lactanius and Diodorus haue found record; For Lactanius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Thydasper, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seauen sonnes, slaine by the Affyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

10 But of these who succeeded Ashaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Affrians, I take the list and number from Exsepius adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

Arbaces.	} Who reigned	28.	yeeres.
Sofarimus.		30.	yeeres.
Medius.		40.	yeeres.
Caradæus.		13.	yeeres.
Dioles.		53.	yeeres.
Phraortes.		24.	yeeres.
Cyaxares.		32.	yeeres.
Astyages.		38.	yeeres.
Darius Medus.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs. that Darius was not only King of Media and had the Perfians his followers; but that the Armie victorious over Balthazar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes tooketh the Kingdome being threecore and two yeeres old: And further, what Officers impleaded him to set over the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stirre up the Medes against thee, &c. and by Ieremie; The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Princes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Italian Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Cassius, Isidore, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Perfians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

Now the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persian onely. For some there are who denie that Alyages had any other Suce Affor him Cyrus was Grand-child by Atandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth that Cyrus was no way descended from Alyages (whom he calleth Alypis or Apamiab) but onely that having vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amysis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and followe followed, and humbly kee sometimes very iustly reprov'd of wilfull vntruth.

Figuring a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produce many probable reasons that Alyfies had no such famous Cyparisses, or Darius Medus; and to continue his opinion the more, he citeth Dindore, Iustine, Strabo, Plut, Arifotle, Isoocrates, and before them Cajor, Thaldis, and Phlegon, who do not indite any such Successor. Neither do Tatimus, Theophilus Antiocheus, Iulius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine, Iustin, Lucilantius, Eufolius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son, or Successor to Alyfies than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab autoritate negatiue, doth neuer enforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme that either Alyages himselfe must haue bene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to giue him some other Successour, according to Iosephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subiect to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe, for this action, but for the deliuey of his Church; a greater worke not onely in the eyes of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all things from the relation of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Onely Daniel in the first, sixth, and sixth Chapters of his prophesies, makes it plaine, that himselfe not onely liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the yere of Daniels death, could not haue bene distinguished from the reigne of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned ioynly; Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§ III.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioyned forces vpon the Assyrians, and others.

THese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrians had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Atedes could be brought vnder his subiection, there should not then bee left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threethree thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioyned, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrians considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Crasus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himselfe so many adherents, as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threethree thousand horse, of which, tenne thousand horse, and fortie thousand foot were ledde by Crasus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Ayattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, utterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Aegypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, possesse himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Crasus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters son, preuailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuiued, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common foot were Archers, or such as vsed the Dart or Sling. So farre Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the patterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much poetical addition: So it cannot be denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon meere Historiographical truth.

Neither can it indeede be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in euery speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politicall discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appeare, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IIII.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great warre.

OR it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achemenes the sonne of Perfes being Governor of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victory obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honour and power to their posteritie, which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deioeces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reigne of Deioeces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and forty yeeres, in the last sixtie whereof there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes; namely, Salmanassar and his Successors, whose great achievements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesseth, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vndertake any offensive warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the successors of Belochius, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioeces to the first of Alyages, there past about nine-tye yeeres, in which if Herodotus haue written truly, that Phraortes conquered Perfes, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had bene but an vnadvised enterprise of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to haue wasted themselves against the Syrians and Aegyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not matters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governor for the Babylonian in Susa or Susan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeede, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Alyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Crasus, which after some fixe yeeres dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not finde any memory. It seemeth that the roughness of the mountainous Country which they then possesse, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more security than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achemenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatness which they afterwards obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulness in reof. But as we finde all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achemenes held the Principalltie of Persia from Father to Sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the father of Cyrus was King of Perſia: than to thoſe that make him a meane man, and ſay, that Aſtiages gaue him his daughter Mindane in marriage, to the end that her ſon (whoſe natuſtie he feared) might be diſabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cauſe of griefe could it be to Aſtiages, that the ſonne of his daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No; it was more likely, that vpon ſuch a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child ſhould haue encreaſed, and his care beene the greater to haue married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I thinke the deuſer of the miſchiefe intended againſt Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confeſſe, That the line 10 of the Achamenide was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperitie did thence deriue himſelfe, and vaunt of it: which hee would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, nor had they beene the vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

{ Achemenes. Cambyſes. Cyrus.	{ Teiſpeus. Ariaramnes. Arſammes.	{ Hyſtaſpes. Darius. Xerxes.
--	--	---

Of the Achamenide there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue male failed in his two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royall family is thus ſet downe by the learned Reineccius.

Achemenes, the ſonne of Perſes, firſt King of Perſia.

Darius.

Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes and Atoſſa, who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artiſtana and other daughters.

Cambyſes had

Cyrus the Great, Cyrus had

Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis ſlaine by his brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond were thoſe ſeauen great Princes of Perſia, who hauing ouerthrowne the ſurſtroyed royalty of the Magi, choſe from among themſelues Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes King.

This Kingdome of Perſia was firſt knowne by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the ſonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elianus, Elyma; by Iſophrus, Elymi.

Suidas deriues this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magnai; which Maguſai, according to Euſebius, are not to be taken for 40 the Nation in generall, but for thoſe who were afterward called the Magi or Wiſe men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their ſayings of them, affirme, That the Perſians were anciently written Artai, & that they called themſelues Cepheneſes. But that they were conſirme: Which alſo S. Hierome vpon Ieremie the ſixe and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight, and alſo in his Hebrew queſtions approoueth, ſaying: Elam à quo Elamite Principes Perſidi, Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perſia.

And that Citie which the Author of the ſecond booke of the Attacabees calleth Perſopolis, is by the Author of the firſt called Elimaſ, but is now called Siras, being the ſame 50 which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great diſhonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander, at the requeſt of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The firſt King of Perſia to vs knowne, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth chapter of Geneſis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Nimrod, and ioyned with him in the warre againſt thoſe Arabians, who was afterward extinguiſhed by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name and firſt actions.

Touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo ſaith, That the ſame was taken from a River which watereth Perſia; his great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the firſt of that name. Herodotus otherwiſe; and that Cyrus ſignifieth a father in the Perſian Tongue, and therefore ſo intituled by the people.

It is true that for his Iuſtice and other excellent vertues he was indeede called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any ſuch ſignification, I thinke it be miſtaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to ſay as the Sunne, in the ſame Language. How ſoever it be, yet the Prophet Eſay, almoſt two hundred yeeres before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus ſaith the Lord vnto Cyrus, his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conqueſt of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conqueſt of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto ſubiect, together with the taking of Craſus himſelfe, are not recounted by Euſebius, Oroſius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements: whoſe opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reaſons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that laſt warre againſt Craſus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the ſixe and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue beene vſed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honor of hauing won Babylon it ſelfe, which in due place I haue answered. The latter ſeemes to haue reference to the ſecond Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled, at which time he ſo eſtabliſhed his former Conqueſt, as after that time theſe Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to be beleue with Herodotus, whom the moſt of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterpriſe of Sardis to preceed that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Croesus the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon Cyrus.

Haue in the laſt Booke ſpoken ſomewhat of Craſus, of his race and predceſſors, as alſo of thoſe Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the firſt (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the ſonne of Atys: Which familie extinguiſhed, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, deſcended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the laſt, who by ſhewing his faire Wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the ſame Gyges (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day ſlaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the ſame to Atys his ſonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thruſt the Cimmerians out of Aſia) and Halyattes begat Craſus: Which ſixe Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and ſeauenty yeeres. Halyattes the father of Craſus was an vndertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre againſt Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it ſixe yeeres: a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions betweene them.

Aſtiages, the ſonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himſelfe greatly honoured by obtaining Argenes, Craſus ſiſter, whom he married.

But Craſus ſo farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall ſtrength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Lydian; onely Nabuchodonſor, after he had ioyned Phœnicia, Paleſtina, and Egypto to his Empire, had thence forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Craſus, notwithstanding the men and treaſure ſpent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet maſtered Eolis, Doris, and Ionis, Prouinces poſſeſt by the Greekes in Aſia the leſſe, adioyning to Lydiu, gave law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Myſians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he alſo inſort the Ephians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compaſſed their citie with *Dianæ*s girdle, Herodotus witneſſeth. More, Herodotus ſaith, Athenæus out of Beroſus (which alſo Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victory which Craſus obtained againſt the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yeerly celebrate a Feaſt, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteeen yeeres.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting alſo, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perillous to himſelfe, he conſulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he preſented with maruellous rich gifts, what ſuccesse he might hope for againſt Cyrus, if he vnderooke him: from whom he received this riddle; Craſus paſſing ouer the River Halys, ſhall diſſolve a great dominion. For the duell being doubtfull of the ſuccesse, payed him with merchan-dize of both ſides like, and might be inuetered either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

Craſus his Expedition againſt Cyrus.

Ereupon Craſus being reſolved to ſtop the courſe of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, deſpiſed all the arguments vſed by Sandaces to the contrary, who deſired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not covered with the ſoft filke of wormes, but with the hard ſkins of beaſts, not fed with ſuch meat as they fancied, but content with what they found: drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, hee could thereby enrich himſelfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and ſubjected, ſo great would his loſſe appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the ſame could neither haſtily be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this ſolide Counſaile, Craſus hauing prepared a powerfull armie, he ſet the ſame towards Media, but in his paſſage, he was arreſted at Pterium, a Citie of great ſtrength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all meanes to ſurpriſe or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in ſtrength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Craſus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; ſo was he not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Craſippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained againſt the gods, becauſe they fauoured a diſturbance and viſper of the Common-weale againſt him who fought for the Romane liberty, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: ſo at this time was the Winter of Craſus proſperity at hand, the leaues of his flouriſhing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and firſt ſpring. The God of all power, and not Admetus Herodotus, Apollo, had giuen date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When theſe two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of diuers ſkirmiſhes, the Persians and Lydians began to ioyn in groſſe troupes: ſupplies from both Kings thruſt on vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had ſomewhat the better of the day, ſo when the darke vaile of night had hid-den each armie from the others view, Craſus doubting what ſuccesse the riſing Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all ſpeece poſſible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his firſt Citie and Regall Seat, without any purſuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arriued, and nothing ſuſpecting ſuſpecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, hee diſmiſſed the ſouldi-ors, and ſent the troupes of his ſundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to re-aſſemble at the end of ſixe moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IIII.

The Conqueſt of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to purſue them, yet not ſo haſtily, and at their heeles, as to be diſcouered. But hauing good intelligence of Craſus his proceeding, he ſo meaſured his marches, as he preſented not himſelfe before Sardis, till ſuch time as Craſus had diſpoſed his armie to their Wirring garrifons: which being altogether vnlooked for, and vnſeared, hee ſurrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Craſus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Gards, after fourteen dayes ſiege the ſame was entered by aſſault, and all executed that reſiſted. Craſus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts ſtrongly encompaſſed, thruſt himſelfe into the heape and miſerable multitude of his vaffals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common perſons vanquiſhed, had not a ſonne of his, who had bene dumbe all his life (by extremitie of paſſion and feare enabled) cried out to the ſouldiers to ſpare Craſus. Who thereupon being taken and imprifoned, deſpoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and ſet on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be conſumed to aſhes thereon. To which when the fire was ſet and kindled, remembering the diſcourſe which hee had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation, he firſt vſed ſilence: but vrged againe, he told them, That hee had now found it true which Solon had long ſince told him, That many men in the race and courſes of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could diſcerne himſelfe for happy indeed, till his end.

Of which anſwere Cyrus being ſpeedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune and his owne mortallitie, hee commanded his miniſters of Juſtice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to ſaue Craſus, and to conſect him to his preſence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perſwaded him? Or what ſelfe reaſon had conſected him to inuade his territory, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus anſwered, It was thy proſperous, and my vnproſperous deſtinee (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inuenter and conductors of Craſus warre againſt Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierſt with Craſus anſwer, & bewailing his eſtate, though victorious ouer it, did not only ſpare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, ſhewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Qua non cauſam ſed fortunam ſpeſtat.

And herein is the reall difference diſcerned between that behauiour which we call Beneficium Latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe ſometime ſparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniuſtly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cauſe and author of his owne euill.

Thereport made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Craſus at the firſt ſight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuiers, and is here already ſet downe, that hee ſhould haue bene burnt aliue. It may very well be, that Xenophon portraying (in Cyrus) an heroyeall Prince, thought an intent ſo cruell, fitter to bee forgotten than rehearſed, as too much miſ-beſeeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neceſſitie of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had hee bene otherwiſe vicious) from ſo cruell a purpoſe againſt his grandmothers brother. Howſoeuer it was, the Morall part of the ſtorie hath giuen much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it paſſe for currant, though the truſt reposed in Craſus afterwards may ſeeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vſe him inhumanely at the firſt.

For as Herodotus himſelfe telleth vs, when Cyrus paſt with his Armie ouer Araxes into Sogdiana, he left Craſus to accompanie and aduiſe his ſonne Cambyſes, Gouvernour of the Empire in his abſence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow Cambyſes.

Cambyſes into Egypt, where he hardly eſcaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greateſt Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians and Lydians; in Balthaſar, Cyaxares, and Creſus.

6. V.
How Cyrus wonne Babylon.

After this Lydian warre enſued the great Conqueſt of Babylon, which gave vnto Cyrus an Empire ſo large and mighty, that he was juſtly reputed the greateſt Monarch then living vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it ſeemes, that tenne whole yeeres did paſſe betwene his taking thoſe two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which neuertheleſſe I doe not thinke to haue bene wholly occupied in prouiſion for the Aſſyrian warre, but rather to haue bene ſpent in ſeeking the Eſtate which hee had already purchaſed. And heereunto perhaps may be referred that which Creſus hath in his fragments of a warre made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained againſt Creſus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus invaded ſcythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, took Amorges their King priſoner: but being in a ſecond battel ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparta, &c. therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewiſe it may be thought, that no ſmall part of thoſe troubles which aroſe in the lower Aſia, grew ſoone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conqueſt was fully eſtabliſhed.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Aſia the leſſe, many Nations, conquered formerly by Creſus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; againſt whom he employed Pallia, and then Harpagus, who firſt reduced the Phocians vnder their former obedience: and then the reſt of the Greekes inhabiting Aſia the leſſe, as the Ionians, Carians, Adolians, and Lydians, who reſolutely according to the ſtrength they had defended themſelves. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it ſelf, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing ſhould be able to diuert him, or to riſe that ſiege, and make fruſtrate the worke vpon which he did ſet all his reſt. And great reaſon there was, that he ſhould bend all his care and ſtrength vnto the taking of that City, which beſide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was ſo ſtrongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, & ſurrounded with waters vnforgoable, ſo plentifully ſuſtained for many yeeres, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their eſtate, but deſpised and derided all purpoſes and power of their beſiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who deſpaired of carrying by aſſault a City ſo well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all ſupplies of victuals and other neceſſaries; whereof though the Towne was ſaid to be ſtored ſufficiently for more than twenty yeeres, yet might it well be deemed, that in ſuch a world of people as dwelt within thoſe gates, one great want or other would ſoone appeare, and vanquiſh the reſolution of that vnderlike multitude. In expecting the ſucceſſe of this courſe, the beſiegers were likely to endure much trauell, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe ſtreight watch and ſtrong guards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vaſt circuit of thoſe walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men ſufficiently aſſured vnto their Commander: The conſideration whereof miniſtered vnto the Babylonians matter of good paſtime, when they ſaw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing bene their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occaſion were offered, than to uſe much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yeſterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoke of ſeruitude. Whileſt the beſieged were pleaſing themſelves in this deceitfull and vaine gladneſſe, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of ſuddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made ſtrong, conſtant, and inuentiue, deſired by ſo many channels and trenches as were ſufficient and capable of Euphrates, and ſo to draw the ſame from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and aſſured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, he

he ſtaied the time of his aduantage for the execution: for he had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betwene the maine riuer which ſurrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthaſar, finding neither any want or weakenſſe within, nor any poſſibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous feaſt, publicke Plaies and other Paſtimes, and thereto invited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobilitie, beſides his wiues, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his prouiſions were either ſufficient, nor onely for all needfull uſes, but euen for ſolitic and exceſſe: Or becauſe he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many diſtreſſes were well neere broken, or in honour of Bel his moſt reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all theſe reſpects. And he was not contented with ſuch magnificence as no Prince elſe could equal, but (uſing Daniels words) he liſted himſelfe up againſt the Lord of Heauen: For he and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowling cups of the Veſſels of God, in contempt of whom he praized his owne puppetts, made of Siluer and Gold, of Braſſe, Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta ſuit ſtultitia in uſibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a fooliſhneſſe was it (ſaith S. Hierome,) drinking in golden Cups, to praize gods of wood and Stone. While Balthaſar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall oppoſite vnto him certaine words, which he vnderſtood not: wherewith ſo great a feare and amazement ſeized him, as the joynts of his loynes were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other. Which paſſion when he had in ſome part recovered, hecried out for his Caldeans, Aſyrologians, and Southſayers, promiſing them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdom to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this diſturbance and aſtoniſhment the Queene hearing what had paſt, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done, uſed this ſpeech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the ſpirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderſtanding and wiſedome, like the wiſedome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor thy father, the King (I ſay) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Aſyrologians, Chaldeans, and Southſayers, becauſe a more excellent ſpirit, and knowledge, and vnderſtanding, &c. were found in him, euen in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Dan. v. 5.

This Queene, Iosephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthaſar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that ſhe was not any of the Kings wiues, becauſe abſent from the feaſt; and being paſt the age of dancing and banqueting, ſhe came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his diſtation: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger yeeres and times, this old Queene remembered well what hee had done in the daies of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthaſar, and kept in minde both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings preſence, who acknowledged thoſe excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promiſes of reward and honour, to reade and interpret thoſe words miraculoſly written, to whom Daniel made anſwere in a ſarre different ſtyle from that he ſaid towards his Grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wiſhed that the ſame might befall his enemies, but to this King (whole neglect of God and vice he hated) he anſwered in theſe words, Keepethy rewards to thy ſelfe, and giuethy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and ſhew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him firſt the cauſe of Gods iuſt judgement againſt him, and the reaſon of this terrible ſentence; whereof the King and all his Wife men were utterly ignorant:

Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodneſſe to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of thoſe benefites, as he deſtroyed him of his care and vnderſtanding; ſo vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he reſtored him to both. This King notwithstanding liſted himſelfe vp againſt the ſame God, and preſuming both to abuſe thoſe veſſels dedicated to holy uſe, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praized and worſhipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Braſſe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore thoſe words, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, P'pharſin, gaue

Dan. v. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his lenne would so soone haue transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so farre off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyfes beene able in such haste to haue vnderaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleene Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace, and that finding in himselfe, that he could not long enioy the world, he called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyfes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaxares; and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortalitye of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deseruing of euery man in this life; hee exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he vttered, which make it probable, that hee received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when hee gouerned Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophesie of Isa, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) praedicted. Which act of deliuering the Iewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Iherusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions hee was an instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth, which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Having therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory ofall which was a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was the Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Reigne, being perhaps the first that euer hie made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Iewes should retorne againe to their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now ended and finished the thre score and tenn: yeres captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them withall things needfull and wanting. He also restored vnto them fise thousand foure hundred thre score and nine Vellsels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthazar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Iewes which returned out of Chaldea vnder their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Iecoonas, and Iesus or Iosua the sonne of Iosadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soone as they arriued, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward thought themselves how to prepare materials for the re-building of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Iewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other idolatrous Nations adjoining gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Provinces nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only so, but those which were but Princi pall Lieutenants and other officers of like place, but Cambyfes himselfe, who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was buied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoeuer Cambyfes did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolve themselves out of *Esdra*s, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Iewes themselves ascribe as it is written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was 66 yeeres in setting vp, hauing received so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seeke the naturall and politique causes which moued Cambyfes to withstand his fathers decree, as well while hee gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and soveraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembred by *Esdra*s, written by Belemus, Atithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phenicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were euery ye rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly don in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, thit Cambyfes, hauing it in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Iewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudea; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might retorne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Gouernours of Phenicia complained against the Iewes, did not precede, but succcede Darius Hytaspes, as in the first and seventh chapters of *Esdra*s it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernours (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclosing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the first of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (so writ, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandement of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahistat Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reigne of Artahistat King of Persia: which was as much to say, as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of *Esdra*s is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Iherusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first let on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyfes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaxares his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusiss; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirtie yeeres, or (according to Iustine) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene Hester.

Cyrus had issue two sonnes, Cambyfes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Ateroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis, Arosta and Ameroe their brother Cambyfes married; Artystona, Darius, Hyaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyfes being dead: who (as some Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Iewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue bene Esther, whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hyaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Persia, was partly gounded vpon the honour which thereby she thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of seeing many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere sound of the two names, Atossa and Esther, (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to haue bene one person. For though it be true, that Esther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Either did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Histories could be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheless did so well know the parentage of Atoffa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a very weake clayme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The estate of things from the death of Cyrus to the reigne of Darius.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

Of the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings and their times, as followeth.

Darius Medus , and Cyrus ioyntly	2

Darius the last, conquered by Alexander .	6
	} yeeres.

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeeres added, make in all an hundred nintie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyfes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melanchton) of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanchton coniectureth, doth not account Cambyfes in the Catalogue, because his reigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Heroaldus haue also a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheless Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this sort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their reignes.

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirtie.

This

This account (as I haue said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peuce in his historical Animaduersion hath gathered the places, finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. vers. 22. 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly Cambyfes in the eleauenth of Daniel, who may indeede be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor vpon the Genesis vnderstands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great fauour and liberality to the Jewes being elsewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixt verse is also named Absuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleauenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great warre which he should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seauen, who is also called Artaxast, c. 4. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verse 24. and cap. 5. verse 6. Nehem, cap. 12. vers. 12.

Seauenthly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arfames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the sonne of Atoffa, Cyrus his Daughter, and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede, Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Alyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Craesus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuasion of Egypt by Cambyfes to the third yeere of the threecore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betwene seuerall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Again, this historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentieth yeere after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar began on the sixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Month of the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twenty Iulian yeeres, and an hundred and forty dayes from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Iulie in the seauenth yeere of Cambyfes.

The Greekes, and namely Diadorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyfes in the second or third yeere of the threecore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyfes seauenth yeere in the first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyfes, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and sixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twente yeeres) it agrees with the third of the threecore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, sauing that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyſes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyſes, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, ſauing the deſire to increaſe the greatneſſe of his Empire: whereof he was poſſeſt in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Cteſias with others giue him a longer reigne than agreeeth with the Graecian account before receiued.

In the fifth yeere of his ſole reigne; and in the third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor & Eusebius, he inuaded Egypt, and hauing ouerthrowne the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not only cauſed him to be ſlaine, but alſo did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the moſt of his children.

Herodotus and Cteſias giue for cauſe of this Warre (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyſes) that when he ſent to Amafis King of Egypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amafis preſented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, for which Cambyſes diſdained.

Howſoeuer it were; true it is, that Cambyſes gathered an Armie ſit for ſuch an enterpriſe, and cauſed the ſame to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amafis died, and left Psammeniticus, whom Cteſias called Amyrteus, his ſucceſſour, who enioyed Egypt after his father (according to the beſt copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him fixe yeeres.

But how long ſoeuer he held the Crowne, in one battell he loſt it, and was himſelfe taken priſoner.

It is ſaid that Cambyſes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only ſpare life to the conquered King, but that he alſo truſted him with the gouernment of Egypt, and that vpon ſome reuolt, or ſuſpition thereof, he cauſed him to be ſlaughtered. But the race of this King was not ſo extirpated, if we may beleue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who cauſed the Egyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the firſt entreated gently by Cambyſes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is alſo written of him, That he ſo much hated Amafis the King of Egypt, who died before his arriual, that he cauſed his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vſed, commanded the ſame to be burnt, contrary to the cuſtome both of the Egyptians and Perſians. For the Egyptians vſed to powder their dead bodies with ſalt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The Perſians durſt not conſume them with fire, which they eſteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carriou.

§. III.

The reſt of Cambyſes his acts.

After this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyſes ſent an Armie into Cyprus, and conſtrained Euelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iſland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyſes yet buſied himſelfe in Egypt, he ſo much deteſted the Idolatry of that Nation, as he cauſed the Images themſelves, with the Temples whererein they were worſhipped, to be tome downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouerturne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Diuell in defence of his Oratorie raiſed ſuch a tempeſt of Sand, wherewith the greateſt part of that Country is covered, as the Perſians were there with choked and ouerwhelmed.

Notwithſtanding which miſadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that diſdaining to be reſiſted, he prepared the reſt of his Armie, which himſelfe meant to conſecond into thoſe parts, but that finding a beginning of thoſe incommodities, which his firſt ſent troupe had tried, he changed his purpoſe. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old Engliſh prouerbe, God ſaith the King, Stay, ſaith the Tide.

After

After his returne from the attempt of Ethiopia, hee cauſed Apis the Egyptian Bull, worſhipped by that Nation as God, to be ſlaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and bene executed as in ſervice of him that onely is, and liueth. But ſoon afterwards, when in a dreame it ſeemed vnto him that Smerdis did ſit in the royal Throne of Perſia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gaue it in charge to his favourite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his owne ſiſter, contrary to the Perſian Lawes, he committed a moſt cauſeleſſe and moſt detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Atroes, then by himſelfe with child, becauſe ſhe beuailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyſes, Herod. 8. p. 50.

That becauſe his predecessors obſerued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, hee aſſembled his Iudges, and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Perſians that did permit the brother to marry his owne ſiſter: it being his owne intent ſo to doe. The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or diſtinctions in ſtore to ſatiate Kings and times) made anſwere, that there was not any thing written allowing any ſuch coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their cuſtomes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Perſian Kings to doe what beſt pleaſed themſelves; and ſo, as Naucleus termes it, inuenerunt occaſionem: That is as much to ſay, as the Iudges found a ſhift to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings priuate ſatisfaction, hee cauſed Siſamnis one of his Iudges, and perchance one of thoſe which fauoured his inceſtuous match, to be ſlayed a-lie, for an vniuſall judgement giuen, and the ſame his hide to be hung vp ouer the judgement ſeate. After which beſtowing the fathers Office on his ſonne, hee willed him to remember, that the ſame partialitie deſerued the ſame puniſhment.

Among other his cruelties, that which hee exerciſed againſt the ſonne of his beloved Praxaspes was very ſtrange and vngatefull. For when hee deſired to be truly informed by him what the Perſians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes anſwered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praiſe from all men; onely it was by many obſerued, that heeooke more than vſual delight in the taſte of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, he viſed this replication: And are the Perſians double-tongued, who alſo tell mee that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes haſt then witneſſed, whether in this report they haue done me right: for if at the firſt thou pierce thy ſonnes heart with an arrow, then is it falſe that hath bene ſpoken; but if I miſſe the marke, I am then pleaſed that the ſame be accounted true, and my ſubiects beleued. This being ſpoken, hee immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent childe, who falling downe dead with the ſtroke, Cambyſes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monſtrous Tyrant greatly reioycing, ſhewed it to the Father with this ſaying in ſtead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maieſt reſolve thy ſelfe that I haue not loſt my wittes with Wine, but the Perſians theirs, who make ſuch report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exerciſed, till at the laſt, according to the phraſe of our Law, he became ſelon de ſoy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cedrenus writeth them Spendanes and Cimerdus) Miniſters of his domeſticall affairs, taking advantage of the great reſemblance betwene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, poſſeſt themſelves of the Empire, he made all haſte towards Perſia, and in mounting haſtily on horſebacke, his ſword diſſheathing, pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedyleſſe repentance of the ſlaughter which he had executed vpon his owne brother, he ſhone after giue vp his wicked gholt, when he had reigned eight yeeres, accounting therein thoſe ſeven Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was abſent.

In Cambyſes the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iſſue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a Daughter called Pantapes, and a ſon called Orantes, who being drowned in the Riuer Ophites by Antioch, the ſame was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orantes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly ſeated, and that of Meroe in the Iſland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his ſiſter Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene Cambyfes and Darius.

Cyrus and his two sonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provinciall Gouvernours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyzus, Alphabarnes, Udarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King;) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, ioyned their forces together, surpris'd and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In which action (saith Isusine) Intaphernes and Alphabarnes were slaine; but Herodotus otherwise, that they were onely wounded, for he auoweth, that all the seuen Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouvernour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence forth. Otanes one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their liberty in equalitie, giuing diuers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified, by the cruelties of Cambyfes; As first, that it was not safe to giue all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedome in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that tyrants doe commonly vse the seruices of wicked men, and fauour them most; they vsurp vpon the lawes of their Countrey, take other mens wiues by force, and destroy whom they please without iudgement.

Megabyzus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intollerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without iudgement, runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is euer found, that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because euen among few diuinitie of concord is seldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath infort the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, farre safer to obseue the lawes of our Countrey, by which Kingly gouernment hath bene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernment by God established, and made prosperous. And to auoid partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seuen Princes should mount on Horsebacke, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sun-rising should first ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment was made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his horse Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie where the election was resolu'd of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mate, who as soone as hee came into the same place was the first horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the seuen Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vsurpation of the Magi, he diuided the whole into seuen gouernments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

§. I.

Of Darius his Linage.

Arius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achemenides, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successor. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had Telspius, who begat Ariamnes, who was father of Arfarnes, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made ialous of Darius, by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Gouvernour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then ioyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the meying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wiues.

Hystaspes, according to Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who disswaded Xerxes from the second Gracian warre. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardanius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius Artozastre his Colen germaine.

Reineccius giues to Hystaspes five sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyfes, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Gouernment, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

D*arius* deuised equall lawes whereby his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue access to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Onely he layd diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not bene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of foureteeen thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyfes made a farre off in Egypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flye to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer-throwes giuen to the Persians vpon Sal-Her. 3. lies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths.

§ III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeere of Darius, he gaue order that the building of the Temple at Iherusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouvernours of those Provinces which are situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phemie, an, and mid-land Sea, (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindered the worke in Cambyses his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thenceforth come nere vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them faire off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul accedite ab illis; with-draw your selues farre from them. In our Englishe, Be ye farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

He also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell therein, destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeeres after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeere of Darius Histaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

§. IIII.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFter the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Isfines calleth Laubinus; and faith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Arme into Scythia, he built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asiathe lesse) to the Ionians, and Asians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne therby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histieus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Grecs, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrey, because they ioyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly reamed them good slaues, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindefull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could haue beene desired. For the great Arme of Darius entering the desert Countie called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chirm Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Gratiars, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggones wherein they carried their wiues and children. These Waggones they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such as Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he began to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a bad game, he sent braue messiges to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile: Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeelde

by faire meanes, and become his Subiect, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer, sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumbe shew Darius interpreting by his owne will, thought that he did yeelde all the Elements wherein those creatures liue, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seauen Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dune under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persians in an campe, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexed the Arme with continuall Alarums day and night; were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsooke his Campe by night, making many fires, and leauing all that were sicke and wake behinde him, and so with all speed marched away towards the Riuer Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians who mist him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which words had certainly become proued true, had not Hyistians the Atleian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

Darius hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre he employed Megabismus, who mastered the Paeonians, and transplanted them, and possesse Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Omaques, the sonne of Sylannes, whom Cambyses had exoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria and * Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadours to Aminas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Sovereignty ouer that Kingdome. Aminas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadours with gentle words, and afterward inuited them to a solemne and magnificient feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, began to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, greater Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to withdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadours, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured yong-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuer reuenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Aminas, gaue his sister Gygis in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall vpon him very suddenly, the warre of Asia the lesse called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the warre which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearfall of the government in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOW the better to vnderstand the reason and motives of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betwene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinency, to be large in unfolding euery circumstance of so great a business as gaue fire to those wars, which neuer could be thoroughly quenched, vntill the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set downe, though scatteringly, & in severall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fiftene or sixtens bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succede him) they changed their former gouernement from Monarchie to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medonide; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

Solon, and others, who are the lesse to be regarded, by reason of the yeerely change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yeere of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after-ages deuised vnto the Romanes, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Tables, which were the ground of the Roman lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice and maintenance of a popular gouernment; the estate of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the sonne of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wound himselfe, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue bene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surpris'd the State-house, or Citadell of Athens, he made himselfe Lord of the Towne, Hegesistratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in euery change of gouernment had sought to remouethemselues further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could soill brooke this vlturpation of Pisistratus, that he was driuen for lacke of helpe to flye the Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus ioyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the dissension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement, so was it soone after well redified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vsuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage, by which alliance the Family of the Alcmaeonide, whereof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmaeonide, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discovery of their intent, perceived no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where he remained eleauen yeeres. Which time being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he gouerned Athens seauenteene yeeres, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three yeeres, sixth Eliahus, but s^{ix} Eusebius hath it, foure and thirty, according to the time belike as well before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus giues the Father and Sonne fixe and thirtie yeeres; Aristotle fixe and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leauing for his Successours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three yeeres before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus was charged with vnnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lamias: who because she would not reueale her Compinions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a stratamity with Antides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampascus, whom he knew to be greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose sonne Hippocles he gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yeeres after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what storne practice against himselfe, he began to vse the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised, during their vlturpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Cleistomachus one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practice their deliuey: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaeonide, together with an Armie of the Lacedamonians, led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarke himselfe, tooke land at Sigium, whence he went to Lampascus in Mysia gouerned by Antides, who presented him to Darius. He was depriv'd of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty yeeres before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Antides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for

Darius.

Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia, perswading and practising the enterprize vpon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour vnder-tooke, twenty yeeres after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motives of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be reformed to Athen by the helpe of Darius, which made him sollicite and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the most vrgent.

§ VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betwene Greece and Persia.

NOther, and a strong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enioyed their libertie about 500. yeeres, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Craesus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Seruants to the Crowne of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witnesseth Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all means possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persians bene giuen vnto them for bridles to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they vsed all means to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had bene lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of seruice Hippias the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as hauing bene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were ready to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Hippias (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindefull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found means to carry him a-long to Susa, where he detained him with all kinde vllage of a friend, yet kept such good eyspiall vpon him, as an enemy, he could not start away. Hippias had subtilty enough to discouer the Kings purposes, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territory, than to sit and feele at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed; being himselfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resoluing vpon this counsell, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had in his Detachment at Miletus, aduising him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came callably to Aristagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprize vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrey of Ionis into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyrannie, and did let Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning wan vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke: and sold as slaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof he lately had bene Admirall in the enterprize of Naxos, he had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers,

Officers, and Captaines, so that now hee thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his necke, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, vnlesse hee were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a iourney to Sparta, where hauing assayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of silitic talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians: hee went from thence to Athen, and with better successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had bene sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring to them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, hauing found very churlish entertainment. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eretrians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient kindnesse that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces ioyned, the Ionians entered the Riuer Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which aduantage they surprised Sardis when no enemy was heard of or suspected; inso much, as Artaphernes, who was Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retreating himselfe into the Castle; which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the Riuer Pattolus, which ran through it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well aduising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the Sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and found them neere Ephesus; where setting resolutely vpon them, hee slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest sauing themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Eualpides, Captaine of the Eretrians perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent vnto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no nor by their teares, bee perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyse in the world, than the late good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellepont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, beganne heereupon to take heart; and entering into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them ayd by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the care of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom he vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athen: To which the sollicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like ynough to haue proceeded, though hee had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Islanders moreover did helpe to furnish out a Naue of three hundred and sixtie saile against him. These prouocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In euery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline,

seemeth, that the invading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Tullius report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the persuader of the enterprise was slaine, saith Tullius and Cicero; but Suidas tells vs, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battaile, and behaved himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first enbeard. Those of the Gracians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeere of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the War made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the sonne of Aminas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch or Thy- lides, after Italy carnassius.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after five and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xanippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weake and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and wilckse people, brought them, not many yeeres after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subiection and slavery. Miltiades left behinde him one sonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than sorrow for the losse receiued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Agyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuence) greatly distracted his resolution for the reuiuacion of Greece. The dissension also among his sonnes, of whom, the younger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and ioyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a yeere after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned five and thirty yeeres. He left behinde him five sonnes, namely Artabazanes, borne before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Agypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

Of Xerxes.

§. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes receiued from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre, one to be made against the Agyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians, of which it is hard to iudge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consulation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artaxoites, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanius, brother to the late Darius, and vncke to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

Hetherfore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vnder-taking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwayes answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of his owne nature, which only the diuine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanius, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Gracian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Agypt was ended, foure yeeres were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of seauenteene hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by seven hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the seuerall Nations were the Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were ioyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Datis, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleete of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Aolians, and Hellepontines: who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artabanius, the daughter of Lydarnes, Princesse of Italy carnassius, and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was embarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates over the Hellespont: and the discourse betweene him and Artabanus upon the view of the Armie.

When this world of an Armie was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seuentene hundred thousand foot, as he entered the body of Celanus, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of silver, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seauen thousand of the Persian Darius, which make so many of our markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not onely refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seuen thousand Darius should be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions, of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the pre-sent. But soone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carcase should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Athos, making the same (with the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountaine and the Chersonesus or Necke of the Land it selfe: a worke of more ostentation than of vs; and yet an enterprife of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so sundered from the maine, were Dion, Olaphysus, Acrothoon, Thysus, and Cleona.

He also gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made ouer the Hellespont betweene Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and dissiuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred threescore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industrie of the Phenicians was so well anchored to resist both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boarded and rayled, the whole Armie of seuentene hundred thousand foot, and fourescore thousand Horie, with all the Moyle and Carriages, past ouer it into Europe in seuen dayes and seuen nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armes did Cesar afterward vs. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea-side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried vp, and seated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into reares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there should not any one suruiue of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncke, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembred, is, That the life it selfe which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that euer found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death, than of liuing; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrowes whereto mankind is subiect, being so many and ineuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear vnto vs ouer-long; to auoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the insuasion of Greece, against which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprife of Greece could not be prosperous: Or whether, according to the change of minde put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe? Artabanus, notwithstanding that hee assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet hee told the King, That there were two things which maruellously affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduerse, to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: in so much, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Hauens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter should be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommunities, will be found by so much the more anemie, by how much the vnstatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of meates to feede such an Army, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered dis-inable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vtter what indeed hee most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not mis-prised them. For to invade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding. Such was the enterprife of Philip the second vpon England in the yeere 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue in it lesse then two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few daies suffer famine, and vsing Machiauels words, Mourir sans couste, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what serued themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine, but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoeuer they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleue Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reuiued at Thermopyle, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresses, Harlots and Horles, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosoever should enterprife any great matter, if hee gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconueniences, hee should neuer pursue the same farther, then the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatnesse, or possist so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer vnderaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newlie conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could bee constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was gether as heavy vpon the Greeks fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein only the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsooke the place of fight, leaving the wracke and spoyle to the enemy, who neuerthelesse were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vnderaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were forcibly crusht in the battaile, and especially because they had receiued a uerisiment of the death of Leonidas at Thermopyle. Before they wayd anchors, Themistocles Generall of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians; that either they should resolue vnto the Greekes, or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§ IIII.

The attempt of Xerxes vpon Apolloses temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHEN Xerxes had passed the straits of Thermopyle, he wasted the country of the Phocians, and the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flye, and rescue themselves to a day of battell, than to aduenture their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth, by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoyle the Temple of Delfhi; which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that had there bene made by diuers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which arriued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rocks, that breaking from the mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraduenture somewhat superfluous. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memory in the Temple of Athena, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleued that Apollo was a god, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couctous desire of enriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was engraued vnto the Diuell, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoyle his gods? and enlarged vnto the Diuell, where; Had any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods: Goe to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heede, and see whether there be any such thing. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alledged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Cardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Citie and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeede, in the enterprise against Delfos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discouraged the face of conuictiōne so much the more vglie, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kinde by meere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he tooke and burnt the Citadell and temple which was therein. The Citadell indeede was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apolloses Oracle; that Athen should be safe in woollen walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palisadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yielded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the propheticie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make difficult the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning to the businesse to words.

§ V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

HE Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, remoued their wiues and children into Trezen, Agina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, and the common liberty of Greece. Neuerthelesse, this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrey, was illrequited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they remoued their wiues and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athen was taken, it was presently resolved vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Plumus: which necke of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, & so to defend Peloponnesus by Land, and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the furie of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Agina haue bene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) haue bene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of losing their owne; which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis. As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedemonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe-same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the first) cause them also to disseuer the fleet, and euerie one of the Confederates to withdraw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate: Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Plumus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the streights; and that, besides the safeguard of Agina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Plumus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by sea, which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gaue him so good advantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one, vnworthy of memorie, vpbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athen, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his owne to inhabit. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auailed more then all his former perswasions. Hee told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; hauing well-neere two hundred good shippes of Warre, the better part of the Gracian fleet, with which it was eatie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned at owne in Italy belonging of olde to the State of Athen, of which towne hee said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proceesse of time should build it a new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our selues, leaving vnto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceived, vpon so weake termes, that they should be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend euen to the utmost of their owne demands.

Fortie Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessary should inforce them so fure, for the preservation of their liberty, did imploy the most of their priuate wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Naue. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrey. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Naue. Wherby it came to passe, that, had they bene vanquished, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual seruerie; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by sea sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and foure score bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the lesser, which they had conceiued of the Persians; and laying aside their insolent brauery, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giuing battaile: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Capitaines giuing such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soone agreed vpon the fight: but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes in this warre in person, was of contrary opinion, Her counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greeke Nauiie (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be disfigured, and euery one seeking to preserve his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had won so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to giue battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (saide she) which wee shall vndergoe, than any need requirerth vs to aduenteure vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would haue done, wee sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is vterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soone reuolte vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Capitaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolved vpon following the more generall, but farre worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue bene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Capitaines vter that, as out of their owne judgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore hee incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Agaleus; which is opposite vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behaviour of euery Capitaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countreimen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a pace thither, did now againe terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor conbrellation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Countrey already lost, when they rather should endeavour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if losing the victory, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently bene done, if the wisdome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiving what a violent feare had stopp'd vp their cares against all good counsaile, did practise another counsell, and forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholesome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busie in wrangling alteration. As soone as the Councell brake vp, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Capitaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Nauiie about the Iland, which encompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleueed these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, assured, if the Athenian fleet ioyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Capitaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemy in reare, and landing many of their men in the Ile of Pisylaea, which lyeth ouer-against Salamis, to saue such of their owne, and kill such of the Grecian partie, as by any misfortune, should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Grecians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquitted it selfe that day, doing no one piece of seruice worthy the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Agina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina hauing possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

§. VII.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFTER this victory, the Greekes intending by way of scrutiny, to determine which of the Capitaines had best merited of them, in all this great seruice; euery Capitaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place as best deserving next vnto himselfe, almost euery Suffrage did concur vpon Themistocles. Thus priuate affection yeelded vnto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was serued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre, but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart, through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the Warre, beganne to cast a wane eye vpon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the current. Wherefore purposing rather to aduenteure his life in pursuite of the victorie, than to cast it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; hee aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece vnder the subiection of the Persian Scepter. Heerewithall he forgot not to soothe Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, that the cowardice of those Asyrians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like mettall, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaued themselves in the late Sea-seruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies bene victorious; and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who presently betooke himselfe to his iourney homewards, making the more haile, for that he vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to faile to Hellepont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather withed his hasty departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not so strong, as it should haue bene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades giue counsell, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessitie should enforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, vnder pretence of friendship, send a false aduertisement vnto this timorous Prince, aduising him to conuay himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dislodged: which counsell Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were to that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly marvellous; though the Greekes did most willingly embrace the later of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrey; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

and

§. VIII.

The negotiations betweene Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himselfe into Thesſalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wiues and children; for as much as they well perceiued that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassador would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest he should finde good and ready acceptance. Heereupon they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Lacedæmonian had audience, vied the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firm. They alleadged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatened the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of iniustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof be ruined, and vsit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wiues and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vied many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which hee might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wiues and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, onely desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likelie, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thesſalie, hauing once receiued such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arrival of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not onely to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often would be desirous to preferue them from fire, & to haue those which were already laid waste, reedified at the Kings charges; Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needs they would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succors did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrillus

Cyrillus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions; and propounded them to the people, all the Senators, & as many as abiding without the Counsaile heard what hee had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad countaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this brauerie notwithstanding, when they perceiued the slackenesse of the Peloponnesians in giuing them aide, they were faine to beake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their securitie. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very seuerie intellages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknes, & threatening withall, to take such course as might stand best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatorie answers, which eery day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a-thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed carelesse & dull, so the Athenians hotely pressed them to a quick resolution giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courtesies, it would not be long ere the city of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw neerer vnto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Naue contained so it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe seruice where need should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest, had aduentured ouer-farre. So mutual feare preferred in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Agæan Seas. But it was well and seasonably obserued by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue care to Mardonius; considering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians vpon this admonition, making better perusal of their owne dangers, were very carefull to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their dilaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans into euening, vnder conduct of Panſanius, they gaue audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distastful such want of grauitie, in a matter so important, were neuertheless contented with the final conclusion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incommence in Attica. The other Grecians were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neere approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Countrey, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure hee burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the fury of Warre.

The great battaile of Plateæ.

It were too long to rehearse all that happened in many skirmishes betweene the Greekes and him, in the Countrey of Boeotia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the seat of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one maine battell: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adioyned the forces of Thibes, Macedonie, Thesſalie, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Armie of one hundred and tenne thousand, of which forty thousand and were weightily armed, the rest were onely assistants to the forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and giue chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victualls beganne to faile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proserpina, making praies vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to find the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeed in the Territorie of Athens; but there was also an olde Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neere vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorialls of those Nymphes, and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citharon, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plataens, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plataens, to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataens caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to redifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being ready for battaile; the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedemonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heauy proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the brauest Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Paulanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Paulanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemie, lie neere to that fountaine which did serue all the Campe. Hauing therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of mere cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedemonians being over-taken by the enemies horse, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Paulanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greece Armie that was in march, being reuoked by Paulanias, came in a pace to succour the Lacedemonians: onely that part of the Armie which was led by the Athenians, could not arriue vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederated with the Persians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuertheless, the Spartans with other their Assistants, did so well acquite themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity enforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresse, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians hauing found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labor and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long pursued, they came to helpe the Lacedemonians, whom they found wearily busied in assaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves vnder-took it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall; at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entered with such furie, and iust desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to haue left three thousand aliue, excepting those who fledde away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified; and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assistants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages, and hauing lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enstamped with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their liues, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leaue them to the slaughtering furie of vnpitefull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessalie, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius vpon some piece of seruice: For he well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great diffcuture, all places would haue bene hostile vnto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and Congest, though soring otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and fought to haue bene brought into slavery. Hereby it may seeme, that the wisdom appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subuersion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entered into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THE same day on which the battaile was fought at Plataea, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greece Nauie, at the request of some Ilanders & Ionians, did saile into those parts, to deliuer the Samiens, & procure the Ionians to renoue from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Iydia, not farre from the Sea-side, hauing left threecore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionis and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them, they did forth-with draw their ships a-ground, fortifying with Pallisades & otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their Land & Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arriuall, perceiuing that they meant to keepe within their strength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally close aboard the shore and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greece tongue to remember liberty, & vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Euboea, trusting that either these Persians would preuaile, or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breed some ielousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne companions. It need not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to reuolt; who now, in his declining estate, gaue a willing care to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former bragging, little regarded and lesse feared any treason to be contriued by their subjects, were now so warie, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycalé; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Capitaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plataea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycalé in the eueing of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Amyilius ouerthrew Perseus the last king of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Liuius with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinius and the Latines, presently noyed at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebelle to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was scaldinly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publike ioy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebelle; and being now with his Armie in march, he receiued aduertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembling the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victorie, he found that the report and victory were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about fise and twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames) among many thousand vaine and frivulous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noyses; as hee raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as hee threatened Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and hee shall beare a noyse, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue bene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne aduerture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Countrey of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius while they went wandring to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Plataea being noyed among them; euery man desired that his owne valor in the present fight, might be some helpe to work out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of spirit, they diuided themselves into two Battalians, whereof the Athenians ledde the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedemonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedemonians could arriue on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honor of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palistados and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not saue themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good seruice; as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who vpon the like alousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycalé, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had been set of purpose to keepe them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedemonians that day did little seruice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troopes; making them flie dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armie leaued against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensive Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had he to reuenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen over to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband, he thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meane to finde occasion of such familiaritie as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reiect him, or the beauty of her Daughter allure him; he soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in War. This yong Lady hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conseruation with her, which he imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceiued extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might be giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer she should inflict vpon the innocent Lady, granted the request; and sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that he vnderstood how villainously that poore Lady should be intreated, whom he knew to be vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; allcading his owne loue, her deserring, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That he now should neither keepe the Wife which he had, nor haue his Daughter whom he had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when he returned home, he found his Wife, most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince he was Gouernor, intending to rebell & auenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to be leuied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is ioynd with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouerthrowne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That he doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, he should againe erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoeuer his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently merclesse.

Therefore we may firmly beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In wars against the Agians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had beene very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his posterity, did euer make offensive warre, but receiued many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale serued but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraigne Countrey: whereof good triall was made forthwith, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countreies, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse many ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Maiestie of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended only vpon the riches and power that had formerly bene acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue bene enuatiated, made vniuersall, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poore and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successors were faine to defend their Crowns with money and base policies; very seldome or neuer (vnlesse it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenture the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielousie vrged every Citie to enuie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Persians had receiued their last blow, and were viterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Gracian Armie, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Ionians, returned with the Lacedamonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had bene leauied. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Seilos, a Citie on the straits of the Hellepont, betwene which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperat of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellepont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the ruination of Athens, and the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and

and the wals of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolued first on their common defence, and to fortifie their Citie, before they cared to conuer themselves, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedamonians being aduertised, and mistaking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnualled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerful by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; nor acknowledging any priuate dislike or ielousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, this same would serue to receiue their encounter, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thibbes had lately bene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolued to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedamonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their wals to that height, as they cared not for their dislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedamon, giuing him for excuse, that hee could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriuall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedamonians expectation being conuerted into ielousie (for by the arriuall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their owne trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolute themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedamonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty alio to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedamonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie, praying the Lacedamonians to beleeue, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Common-weale and their owne safety, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the wooden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereby taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne iudgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes: And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities considered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedamonians finding the time vsit for quarrell, dissembled their dislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and receiued backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pireus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselves vpon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Persian.

The Athenians hauing settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedamonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set saile for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Panfanias the Lacedamonian; where after their landing hauing possesed themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouring from the

the Perſians by force the Citie Bizantium, now Conſtantinople: from whence Paſaniſes, behaving himſelfe more like a Tyrant than a Capitaine, eſpecially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedæmon, and not onely accuſed of many inſolent behaviours, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treason againſt his Country. In his ſtead they employed Darius, who either gaue the ſame cauſe of offence; or elſe the Athenians, who affected the firſt commandement in that warre, practiſed the ſouldiers to complaine; though indeede the wife and venomous behauior of Ariſtides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable ſincerity, had beene able to make a good Commander ſeeme ill in compariſon of himſelfe; and therfore was much more available, in rendering thoſe deteſted, whoſe vices afforded little matter of excuſe. How ſoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no leſſe wearied of the warre, than the Athenians were eager to purſue it, the one obtained their eaſe, and the other the execution and honor which they deſired: for all the Greekes (thoſe of Peloponneſus excepted) willingly ſubjected themſelves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatneſſe in that preſent age, and of their ruine in the next ſucceeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Citieſ, they appointed receivers and Treasuſers, and began to leuie money, according to their diſcretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of thoſe places on Europe ſide, in Aſia theſſe, and the Iſlands, from the Perſians. This tribute (the firſt that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threeſcore Talents; which was raiſed eaſily by the honeſt care of that iuſt man Ariſtides, to whoſe diſcretion all the confederates reſorted themſelves, and no one man found occaſion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Ariſtides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie, ſo the deſire which they conceived of encreaſing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treaſure, which with her in the next age periſhed. For it was not long ere theſe foure hundred and threeſcore Talents were rayſed to fixe hundred, nor long after that, ere their couetous Tyrannie had conuerted their followers into ſlaves, and extorted from them yeerely thirteene hundred Talents. The Iſle of Delos was at 39 the firſt appointed for the Treasuſe-houſe wherein theſe ſummes were layd vp, and where, at the generall Aſſembly, the Capitaines of thoſe forces, ſent by the confederates, were for ſome ſake called to conſultation. But the Athenians, who were ſtronger by ſea than all Greece beſides, had lockt vp the common treaſure in an Iſland, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might tranſport it at their pleaſure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the ſonne of Aſtiades, who firſt tooke Eion, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Iſle of Sciros, inhabited by the Delopes: they maſtered the Carſij, &c. brought into ſeruitude the Naxij, contrary to the forme of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or diſobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and viſping a kinde of ſoueraigne authority ouer the reſt: which they exerciſed the more aſſuredly, becauſe they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be reſiſted. For many of the confederated Citieſ and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne perſons, and giuen vp altogether to their eaſe, made choiſe rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in ſhips; leauing the prouiſion of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exerciſe of the Warres; the other greatly ſtrengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and employed in honourable Seruiſes, at the coſt of thoſe, who hauing liſted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, le- 50 uied vpon theſe their confederates, employed ſo well by the Athenians at the firſt (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cauſe of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall ſcouring the Aſiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phœlis; which hauing formerly pretended neutrality, and reſuſed to relieue, or any way aſſiſt the Greekes, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and ſo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yeerely contribution.

From thence he ſet ſayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perſian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of fixe hundred ſayle, or (according to the moſt ſpaciſe report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Army, encamped vpon the ſhoare; all which forces hauing bene prouiſed for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were utterly deſtroyed in one day, and two hundred ſhips taken by the Athenians; the reſt being broken to pieces, or ſunke, or euer they had ſwom in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoone preſented with a third. For foureſcore ſayle of Phœnicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, vnder the Perſian command) thinking to haue ioyned themſelves with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arrived vpon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than what enſued. Vpon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-land, called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they onely ſought to run themſelves on ground; by which meane preſeruing few of their men, they loſt all their ſhips. Theſe loſſes did ſo breake the courage of the Perſians, that, omitting all hope of preuailling vpon Greece, he conſcended to whatſoever Articles it pleaſed the Athenians to propound, granting liberty vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Aſia; and further covenanted, That none of his ſhips of War ſhould ſayle to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the moſt honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Perſia, in which war, few or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but ſerued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treaſon of Artabanus.

BESIDES theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily haue bene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gaue iuſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking peace vpon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhed the blood of ſuch, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repoſe leſſe hope of a liſt in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignie, by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his cruelty, and deſpised for his cowardice and miſfortunes. Hauing conceived this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelfe had bene innocent) he accuſed Darius the ſonne of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneſſe he got the Kingdome, and held it ſeaſon moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the ſonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuened and ſurpriſed, it were hard to aſſirme any certainty. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the ſentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verſe:

Seldome the villaine, though much haſte he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance failes to ouer-take.

§. IIIL

The baniſſment of Themistoctes: His flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Perſia; & his death.

ARTAXERXES being eſtablished in his Kingdome, and hauing ſo compounded with the Athenians, as the preſent neceſſity of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greekes, than he or his predeceſſors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their owne merits in that ſeruiſe, that they not onely thought it fit for themſelves to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Iſlands of the Greekes, but euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democraticall. Herein they were ſo inſolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preferre the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to flatter all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for ten yeeres, as a man ouer-burthened to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedamonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himselfe into Perfia, where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Libyan, (who infected Agypt, causing it to rebell against the Persians) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Agypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikelienesse of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece, or elses in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported; the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict betwene thankfulness to his well-deseruing Prince, and naturall affection to his own ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Agypt.

When was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Captaines in the Agyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a iust cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to reliue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had beene concluded, which was likely to haue bene kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate, yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waltze of an enemy too far out-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worse fortunes he had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assistance into their hands, as might viterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues & power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilseth they might, whatsoeuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betwene Cilicia, Syria and Agypt, is very fitly feared for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countries, or to infect one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morfell, to smatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily haue swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Libians confining Agypt, hauing found how greatly the Countrey was exhaubted by the late warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceiued rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrap or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Gardes, or leue out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated; the naturals of the Countrey, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdom than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance; would easily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for King. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly slaine Achomenes the Viceroy; diuers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the warre. But he considering his owne weaknesse, and that the meanes of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceiued well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarked; he inuited the Commanders to share with him the kingdom of Agypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would haue bene contented with an equall share, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnecessary. He was possessed of the peoples loue, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprize very good and hopefull successe: For they entered the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Agypt, were strong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes well deuise what meanes to vse for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedamonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainment of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedamonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Agypt; he thought it his wisest way to imploy the rest of his mony and meanes to their reliefe, who had now the space of sixe yeeres defended his masters right in Agypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Agypt, was first encountered by the reuoluted people; ouer whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilseth the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessities made the Athenians inferior to themselves; he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were forced to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Protopotes, where Megabazus, after eigheteene moneths siege, turning away one part of the River by diuers Trenches, assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the sword, saue a few that saved themselves by flight into Libia; the same countenance had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred.

taken, whereby the Bacians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubœa tooke such courage vpon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedæmonians, & submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenians Garrisons, and ioyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, & Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speede, but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plisotax, the sonne of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeeres.

After sixe of these yeeres were expired, the Athenians (sauiouring the Mylefians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc't to yeele themselves vpon most lamentable conditions, Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had bene taken by themselves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeeres after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrey at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Greece was neuer vniued vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeele obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian warre (deemed the Generall quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victory, to their owne vse and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserued best the plague of tyranny, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrey by perpetuall Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-masted all, forasmuch as euery conclusion conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the warres, commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authority of the Amphibolians, who were the generall Councell of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

The Lacedæmonians had liued about foure hundred yeeres vnder one forme of Gouernment, when the Peloponnesian warre began. Their education was onely to practise states of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintain him in such manner as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefely, they liued Nepian-like, fine that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betwene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastie in the execution: The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood performe what the Athenians did visually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that sought honor & not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them p force, being held in streight subiection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrell against Athens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuentene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Naue, & (assisted by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persians; though in deede they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and haue Townes, of their owne Countreymen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Platæans, when they of Platæa repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be entangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise: for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

Euerthelesse many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, inroached apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue taken. Now howeouer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redresse by warre the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the estate of Athen, should be set at liberty, and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reuerled. This last point they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preferre their reputation without entering into a warre, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vndergoe.

But the Athenians would yeelde to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepar'd on both sides very strongly, all that was needefull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretend'd to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all provisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subiects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian warre.

THe first and second yeeres expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athen. For the fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrey people driven to flye, with Wiues, Children, and Cattail, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neuer felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the siege of Plataea their confederated Citie, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrowes received. The Lacedemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Attica, and therein abide, untill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things roundabout: The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilst they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Towne of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not bee succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedemonians beganne to perceiue how vnto they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athen was plentifully relieued with all necessities, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these invaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Naue, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they receiued at Pylus a verie sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, waiting in that passage, as their trianner was, the coast of Lacedonia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus; which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head Land and Ille. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and site of the place. By holding this peece of ground, and haue, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subiection, yet was not the olde hatred so extinguished, that by the neere neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be reuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of her bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Lacedonia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haue, lying almost in the mid-way betwene them and Corcyra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Naue, to recover this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grieuous losse at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the haue, placing foure hundred and twenety choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betwene the Ile and Pylus; likewise but seuen or eight shippes could enter at once by the further channell, betwene the Iland and the Main. Hauing thus taken order to shut vpon this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood; and other stufke, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke vp the peece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haue, did breake and sinke many of their Enemies vessels; tooke siue, and so enforced the residue to runne themselves aground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the campe (as was their custome in great dangers) to aduise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Ille, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the campe. That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Ille, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athen, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedamonians did sue to them for peace, admiring them to make an end of warre, whilst with such reputation they might. But they finding them to be contrary to their expectation: For instead of concluding vpon even termes, found all contrarie to their expectation: the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedamonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was decreed the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was decreed the ships, which had beene put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) yee haue assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are wee acquainted with our promise to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so far ouer-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedamonians driuen to vse many hard means, for conuincence of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedamonians were so farr from waisting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countre to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus, which became the Rendezous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedamonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Therefore they endeouored greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with continuance of good success, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meere through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferior vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their owne-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedamonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most beene aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedamonians, who not onely felt the like wounds, but through the great Naue which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it onely a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoid. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a truce of thirty yeeres well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferior to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedamonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe.

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by waisting the Territorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not onely the Athenians should haue beene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the war was vnder-taken, haue been so firmly knit to the Lacedamonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argives, to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, and meanes to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet from any great harme, than the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Naue, could doe vnto them; yea as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily traualles, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedamonians were glad to vse the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much adoe they procured, as seemed equall and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their traualles was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedamonians should restore first. These had wonne more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and diuiclers, and not compelled them to breake in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, which they had gotten in the Warre; as for the rest, they promised more then afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithstanding whatsoeuer articles were drawne, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring onely the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receiue the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedamonians entred into a more streight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to haue sued for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselves plainly vnwilling to giue eare to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded not the seditions of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deferring in the late warre, or found for trouble some, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) was little worse than friendship. It bred great calouise in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue such a coniunction between two so powerfull Signiories: especially one claue threatening every one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countre, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown vpon the Lacedamonians their vnusult friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue beene abandoned to the discretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vnderstood the aduantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betwene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherewith all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnresistable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that City was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not standing very honourable, this common opinion was not onely abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreame) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedæmonian would haue endured to lay downe his weapons, and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should haue becne so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise then by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especial marke, being ouer-laid by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not onely the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities ioyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose ability, to do much, they conceiued a strong beleefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing inuirtuouslie our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting in our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuy at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did onely murther at the peace, alledging as grievances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; feare of reuenge to come, working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argiues seeing the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelue of their Citizens, a full & absolute commission to make alliance between them & any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to leade the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by priuate respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconuenience might arise vnto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceiued that the multitude had bene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present advantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason & religion to vse all means of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were peltence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vnderaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would doe as they should finde cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to ioynne themselves with Argos, and caused other Stateto doe the like; so that Sparta & Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hasty conclusion of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diuersitie both of sinceritie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argiues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did onely hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argiues in war, yet rather the Argiues in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argiues, as they had done: but the different formes of government, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innouation, by ioyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at gone time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomacke then force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta & her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may cleerely be seene the great aduantage which absolute Lords haue as well in peaces as in warre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath bene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demaend themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedæmonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late warre, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panactæ, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) vnlesse that they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which they upon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to bee contrarie to the last agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians hauing broken one article of the league made betweene them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panactæ, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the

the Athenians. This was sought to haue beene excused by the Lacedemonian Embassadors, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemy to Athens should nestle in Panaſte, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame ſchools. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsed ſuch baſe collusion as ſtood not with their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Couenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yere, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by Couenant, especially Pylus that had so forely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobilitie, riches, & fauor, with the people, made him desire warre, as the means, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment; vsed all means to set the quarrell on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendered ought faue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedemonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedemonians should, and might require, vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereto they were bound, euento the utmost point. This was enough to make them ſwear, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuey of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderstand how slyly the time serued for them to associate themselves with Athens, which was enough to giue themselves curitie against all Enemies.

The Argiues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these suddain apprehensions of vaine ioy, were suddainly changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately beene conceiued of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance, when the Corinthians had sought securitie from Athens; and when a false rumour was noyed abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then began the Argiues to let fall their crests, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedemonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not ouer-hastie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argiues, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensue, betweene their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedemonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to preuent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to stick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued then all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controversies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panaſte, concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieued ued the Lacedemonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters euen betwene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argiues might be called aside. Favourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedemonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship to wards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Commonalty of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeeld to nothing, vntill they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleued him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as he had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie; that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argiues and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, vpon whom a pleasing errand would very hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedemonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene seconded with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so faire did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, vntill hee himselfe with other Embassadors might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seeme a great wonder, how so poore a trick of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might haue cast the load vpon his owne shoulders, by discourting the truth: But the grauitie which was usually found in the Lacedemonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsoinely against so nimble a witte; and they might well haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sower message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedemonians should take the paines to rebuild Panaſte, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argiues, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans; assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a new to keepe the Articles of the league betweene him and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadors, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argiues, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample protition for holding the same common friends and enemies; whetm; though the Lacedemonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in thort while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedemonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation; which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundrie passages betwene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whole Amitie; they had left sundrie of their olde friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in warre, all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

§. VII.

How the peace betwene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellows had found business where-with to set the Athenians on worke, and make use of this conjunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostile were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infest each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a new to range themselves vnder the Lacedemonians, and follow their designs. One victorie which the Lacedemonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neere to Maninae, against the Argive side, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The ciuill dissension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betwene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Maninians to the like. But in short space of time the multitude preuailing, reuersed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vapours in Peloponnesus, many affaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readines for execution, prevented some things, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians warning matter of quarrell; and the Lacedemonians growing wearie, they began to be quiet, retaining still that enmities in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight, and utterly dispersed.

DURING this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whether they sent a fleet so mighty as neuer was sent forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to go great an expedition. All which came to nought, partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuen to banish himselfe, for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vndergone, among the incensed people; partly by the inuasion which the Lacedemonians made vpon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so farre from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Perfia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neyther was the successe of things in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens, could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterprize had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of all the Iland, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtaining the better in sundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieved with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worke on all sides, in such wise that their fleet was shut vp into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affaies went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand vpon hard terms, for that the Lacedemonians, who had bene formerly accustomed to make wearisome ycerely iournies into Attica, which hauing pilld and foraged, they returned home, did now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fild vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Deceles, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countie round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it selfe. In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backs, and at their owne dores, an enemies little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicily, in inuade a people no lesse puissant, which had neuer offended them.

Often happens, that prosperous euents makes foolish counsaile seem wiser than it was; which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was to shid to turne vnto the best. But where vnfound aduice, finding badde proofe, is obstinately persued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuey home the former that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracusanians, was finally (together with the other part of the Naue, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the haven of Siracuse, wherby the campe of the Athenians, vterly deuiued of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and flie away by Land; in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrowen in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned to exile Sophocles and Pheidorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeed there was not any meanes or possibility to haue made warre. Heereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this unhappie enterprize, did rather choose to hazard the ruine of his Countie by the losse of that Armie, wherein consisted little lesse then all the power of Athens; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolved to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessitie required it. For (said hee) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue eare to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether barken to suspicious and vaine rumors that shall be brought against vs; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to retorne in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willet, not what opinion expecteth; & to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report & censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his people, and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetie than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the campe break vp till tuesen and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, and the course of Nature, would be as vnjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cæsar the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retrying, the broken remainder of *Cæsar*s his Armie defeated by the Parthian Archers, was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answere that hee stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that goodrule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Governours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vnjust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Army, in Sicilia.

THe losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accompted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about seuen yeeres after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subiects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconuenience were set at libertie, promising onely to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subiects; others hauing a kinde of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captaines which were also ad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocracie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most like to withstand this inuouation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismayed, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but this man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maiestie of Athens was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obliuing in this the ancient forme of proceeding, did cawle all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had they dede were onely such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than onely to approue and giue consent: for whosoeuer presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquier made of the murder. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first bene very well contented in Sparta, whilst his seruice done vnto that State was not growne to be the object of enuie. But when it appeared that in Counsaile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedemonians, that all their goodnesse was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearied of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so farre yeeled her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her yong childe by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouering the Spartan trechery, conueighed himselfe vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beauty, sweet conuersation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-royes affections, who had free power to dispose of the great Kings Treasures and forces in those parts. Then began he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so farre forth to assist the Lacedemonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation he the onely favourite of so great a Potentate he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemy. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie wherof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure; and partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedemonians, desiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authoritie & the greatness of their Citie, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather with to preserve their owne power, or safetie at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry ouertures of peace to the Lacedemonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wauering multitude, especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristocracie, to which forme they had now reduced Athens. All these passages betweene the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which vpon iust ground the enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not knowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Naue of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bene regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neere adioyning, any terror of the warre. For the dissension within the walls might soon haue done more good than could be received from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeede gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vnrie, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by meanes of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authoritie, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraigne enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of government a full restitution of the soveraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but onely to foure thousand; which company the foure hundred (when their authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as assistants: herein seeming to doe little wrong or none to the Commonaltie, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should be recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos should be requested to vndertake the government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades wonne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile, made their Generall, and againe deposed.

THis establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good successe in the warres. For the Lacedemonians were about the same time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battail; by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards ioyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydos his arrual with eigheteen shippes, gaue the honour of a great battail to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and utterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedemonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransom their Citie, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distress of the Armie in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which euen in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driuen to banish himselfe againe; onely because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, hee had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniurie receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the fleet, he presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to undertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fiftene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had bene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Alcibiades withdraw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellepont, called Bizantie, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battaile at Arginuse, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiuing many losses and discomfitures, were driuen to flee into the Hauens of Mystene, where they were strightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity forced them to man their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginuse, where Callicratides, Admirall of the Lacedemonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue bene expected, that the tenne Captaines, who ioyntly had command in chief: ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happy a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessells to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Here to the Captaines readily made a very iust answer, That they pursuing the victory, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindered the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That hee himselfe escaping in a meale tubbe, had bene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrie should be ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, saue onely Socrates the wife and veruous Philosopher, whose voice in this iudgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other vessells in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this iudgement was reuersed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceived and peruered the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of iniustice; but the diuine iustice was not a sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The battaile at Argos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian warre.

The Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeere next following, hauing scowred the Aegean Seas, entred Hellepont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and tooke the Town of Lampacus. Hereupon all the Nauie of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste; but finding Lampacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselves, they sailed to the River called, Argos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Gates-Brooke, of the River of the Gates, being on the Continent, opposite to Lampacus; & there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampacus in the harbour. The next day after their arrivall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Argos-Potamos, & thus they continued sixe daies, brauing euery day the Enemy, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countymen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making warre in his owne name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a roade subiect to euery weather, neither neere enough to any Towne, where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so farre off as had bene more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-Towne, thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Nauie euery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not farre off, or at least to consider how neere their enemy was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so haue done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Streights, who assailing the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath bene rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how euill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Hauens, was not slackest in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his maner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessells after them, who observing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they roamed vp & downe the Countrie, he kept all his men a-board after their departure, & the fifth day gaue especiall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians disembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speede that strength of Oares could giue, to Argos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-board their Ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion vpon the news of his approach.

In so much that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Athens as desperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seuen and twenty yeeres, with variable success concluded in one hour, & the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that the neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victory Lysander, hauing taken such Townes as readily did yield

yeelde vpon the first fame of his exploit, set sayle for Athens, and ioyning his forces with thole of Agis & Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie; which finding too stubborn to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all prouision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the Citie, & enforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long walls, leading from the Town to the Ports, should be throwne downe; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should be set at liberty; That the Athenians should be Masters onely of their owne Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Towne; And that they should keep no more than twelue Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedamonians did, and follow the Lacedamonians as Leaders in the Warres.

These articles being agreed vpon, the walls were throwne downe with great reioicing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens, and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former infolency and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The onely small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alciades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedamonians thereof, who continued, and (as now domineering in euery quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedamonians abusing their reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (beside sother great losses receiued) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing, for the feuerall Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne so iaculous one of anothers greauesse, that the Lacedamonians, Athenians, Argiues, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather euenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had bene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romanes presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselves indeede become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably enioyed a long reigne ouer the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greece Historians (slightly passing ouer Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short reigne little to be regarded) place next vnto them, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue bene the the sonnes of Hester) held the Kingdome but one yeere betweene them, the younger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I haue said before) to pursue the Historie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearsal of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a moneth or two, if not by himselfe, then by treachery of his as riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew vniustly Bogorazus a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseene it, and by raising a stronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leaue, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing slaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeeres. Amyrtaus of Sais an Aegyptian rebelled against him, and hauing partly slaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmly with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained against the Persians, all the dayes of this Darius, and of his son Artaxerxes Amnemon. Likewise Amorges, a subiect of his owne and of the Royall blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicill, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Ilanders and others, subiect to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedamonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Naue, without which it was impossible to aduance the warre against the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driuen to craue his assistance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league betweene him and them were set downe in more precise termes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre ioynly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre ensuing (of which I haue already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedamonians he got Amorges a-lue into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Iusis; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuerthelesse Aegypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece; for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subiects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindefull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that euer Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a iaculous eye vpon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subiect: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death prevented the coming of his younger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall haue occasion to speake somewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place very conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the walls of Athens, which gaue end to that war called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the unhappy Countrie of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Governours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of such such ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give iudgement in particular causes, to whose iudgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become subiect. But these thirty hauing lo great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deferre it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublefome fellows, as were odious to the Citie, though not punishable by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bekinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be vnto these thirty men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbours of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without due trial and proofe had bene once well allowed. Having thus plaubly entred into a wicked course of gouernment, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a fire guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedaemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirty, to keepe the Citie free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behoued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedaemonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirty, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after bale and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of gouernment: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenus (one of the thirty) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discouraged, caused his fellowes to bekinke themselves, and prouide for their owne security, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they disarmed; and hauing thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to tread the blood, not onely of their priuate enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that euery one of them should name one man, vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenus vntred his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirty was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but haue the accustomed trial) he took vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenus, and (so reduced him vnder the trial and sentence of that order. It was well alledged by Theramenus, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; vpon which consideration, he aduised them all to conceiue no otherwise of his case, than of any of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but euery man choosing rather to preferre his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neere him) the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poyson.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirty Tyrants, and their deposing.

After the death of Theramenes, the thirty began to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and and goods, and caused them to flye into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This Aight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and refused to hazard their liues in setting free the Citiē of Athenes. The very thought of such a practice had bene treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuentie men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Capitaine Thrasybulus tooke Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athenes. No sooner did the thirty heare of their exploit, than theye meanes to prevent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedaemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the Citiē, which aboute all this while they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to waite out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were increased from feuentie to seuen hundred, which amounted to sixe charge upon those guards, of whom they cut off aboute an hundred and twenty. These finally, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athenes, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the thirty had refused to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne use, wherinto they might make an easie retreat, and save themselves from any sudden perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouvernement had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtaine men good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iustice) murdered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefes which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellows, who as yet were teamed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slaine to the number of feuentie onely, yet the victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vied by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were deposed. Neuertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of government could be established. For Embas-sadors were sent to Sparta, who crauing aide against Thrasybulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedaemonians. And here appeared first the realousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Boeotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had bene the most bitter enemies to Athenes, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, lest the Lacedaemonians should annexe the Territorie of Athenes to their owne Do-maines. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias as tooke this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but onely to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such meanes, that all things were composed quietly: the thirty men, & such others, as were like to giue cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation, wherupon the whole Citiē rising against them, tooke their Captains, as they were coming to Paria; & slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotte, & no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, & carefully obserued, the City returned to her former quietnes.

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

6. I.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

TH E matters of Greece standing vpon such tearmes, that no one Esteate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedamon; young Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully persecuted the warre against Lathens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which hee had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generally, the Lacedemonians gaue license. And so this request, commanding their Admirall to performe unto Cyrus all feruence that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discouered himselfe, and the Lacedemonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue bene the recompence of his services; or that he perishing in battaile, as later he did, the subuerfion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the wayes, which vnder the Macedonian Ensignis, their glorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he referred to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mighty Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Parysatis, the Queene Mother of Cyrus bare vnto Cyrus her younger sonne, being seconded by the earnest loue of the people, and ready desires of many principall men, had moued this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established to surely by the old Kings fauor, that it were not safe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour, himselfe might easily lose the place of a Viceroie, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The neereit neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardice, trechery, craft, and all vices which accustomedly branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, ysing by the way all fair shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queene Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had vsed the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alledging that (which in former ages had bin much auailable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilest his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing, when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tissaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent backe into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the warre.

He forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsied in their seuerall Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meete, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held onely at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conceit as it to be. Cyrus therefore being fetled in Lydia, began to confider with himfelfe, the intereft that he had in the Kingdome; the fmall affurance of his brothers loue, held onely by his Mothers interceffion; the difgrace endured by his late imprifonment; and the means which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedaemonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himfelfe. Neither was it expedient that he fhould long ftie idle, as waighting till occafion fhould prefent it felfe: but rather enterprife fomething whilet yet his Mothers liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worfe than onely questionable. Hereupon he firft began to quarrell with Tiffaphernes, and feized vpon many Townes of his iurifdiction, annexing them to his owne Province, which difpleafed not Ariaxerxes at all, who befides that he was of condition fomething fimpler being trulye paid by Cyrus the accuftomable Tributes out of thofe places, was well contented to fee his brothers hot fpirit exercifed in priuate quarrels. But Tiffaphernes, whole bafe conditions were hated, and cowardize difpifed, although he durft not adventure to take armes againft Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milefians were about to giue vp themfelves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Townes of the Ionian had done, thought by terrour to prefew his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he flew many, and many he banifhed, who flying to Cyrus, were greatly entertained, as bringing faire occafion to take armes, which was no fmall part of his defire. In leuying Souldiers he vfed great policie; for he tooke not onely the men of his owne Province, or of the Countreies adioyning, whole liues were ready at his will, but fecretly he furnifhed fome Grecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, fome of them waiting in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elfewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to croffe the Seas, at the firft call of Cyrus, till which time they had fecret intrufions to prolong their feuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercife, and ready in armes vpon the fudden. Cyrus hauing fent a power of men to befiege Miletus, forthwith fummoned thofe bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his affiftance, being thirteene thoufand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almoft incredible) againft the whole power of Ariaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuiued before, he could very eafily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tiffaphernes out of Asia the leffe: but his purpofe was not fo to lofe time in fmall matters, that was to be employed in the accomplifhment of higher defignes. Pretending therefore that the Pifidians, a people of Asia the leffe, not fubied to the Persian, had invaded his Termini, he raifed the fiege of Miletus, and with all fpede marched Eaftward, leauing Tiffaphernes much amazed, who had no leifure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himfelfe, when he confidered, that fo great an Army, and fo long, was neuer leuiued againft the Rouerers of Pifidia, but rather againft the great King his Mafter. For which caufe taking a band of five hundred horfe, he pofted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

The tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great exclamations of the Queene Statura, against Parjatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But while the King in great fear was attending the high Countries in his defence, the danger lasted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, raising his number much increased, by the repaire of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by trial in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aid:) he made in Phrygia, where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Armie, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a brauery) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggageers forsaking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed having that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard Estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to haue Made them yeelde unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might serue for foode: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enioy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his people, and weaknesse of his Emprer, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore he resolved, to try all meanes, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seeme: to which purpose he sent them a braue message the next morning, Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Arius, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight milles from them, whence intending to returne into Asia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day awaiting for them so long if they would ioyne with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer backe to Arius, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would ioyne with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Capitaines very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeelde their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelde to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship, for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Grecian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered: That the King hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Riuer, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruicable; but should they yeelde them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes and Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a businesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a States-man, to be cheekt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoeuer he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowen than that he brought an vn honest message to his owne Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treacherie of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and hauing neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their their seruice in Agypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vsc of them. But the shall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Herevpon Phalimus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I vnderstand you? as choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise warre? And Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politike Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you, and so dismissed him, not willing that he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vpon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes began to returne home wards.

IT night they tooke their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid-night, being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they beene kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutuall assistance vnto the last: Wherevnto both parts hauing sworne, he aduised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, & tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselves to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weaknesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Grecians being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrey, should be very fearefull: but it is almost past belief, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that instead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadours, to enreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run ouer the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting wherevpon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieue them.

How Tissaphernes, vnder colour of peace, betrayed all the Capitaines of the Greekes.

Hitherto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any straights or teares of disadvantage. But now came vnto them the subtle Foxe Tissaphernes, who circumventing the chiefe Commanders by fine sleighes, did maliciously entrappe them, to the extreme danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Province, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement, knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrey at home, would not be vnthankfull for such a benefite. Herevnto he forgot not to rehearse the

the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewd his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alleadge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leave to conduct you safe into Greece; in which suite I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a mild answer to him, who hath willd me to aske you, for what cause ye haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were, That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties hauing sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all businesse, came vnto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they let forward. This interm of twenty dayes, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arius, reipning daily to him, and other Persians to his Shoulders, did worke him and them to with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relye vpon couenants, and sit still whilest the King layd snares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselues againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their owne wants, and the Kings meannes, but especially the Oath mutually giuen and taken, wherewith he saw no reason why the enemie should haue clogged himselfe if he meant mischief, hauing power enough to doethem harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his fallshood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyar. A lyer may finde exalte when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the fallshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his owne strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom he subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contriued thus: Hauing traquiled some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very ialous of the great familiarity appearing betwene Tissaphernes, and Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past betwene them, shewing how religiously he would keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tissaphernes, he promised that their loue should appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vse of their service against the Myssians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Prouince, or against the Aegyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all diuine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iust ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies he could haue used to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by by burning the country, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs haue perished by mercuriall famine. For which cause he said that it had beene great folly, to lecke by periuirie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their safetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance: but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentlemen to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention betwene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferior Leaders, to repaue with him to the Campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had been to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Persian Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondered much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping forely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Arnie, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arius deliuered to this effect: That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was iustly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honored: and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Armes, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but hee willed them to send backe Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persians. Hereunto the Embassadors know not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward receiued. He saw his Prouince wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiuing from his Master conuenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor periuirie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailed him; finally, the King was ialous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his Shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flee from the stroke, all the word being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischief vpon the whole Arnie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heauinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not well how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Arnie to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to aduise the vnderunder-Officers of Proxenus's companies; whose familiar friend he had beene, to be-thinker themselves of some meane, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Soul-diers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoeuer might serue for togiether them hope, and aboute all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vpon such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were flaine, or taken.
This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes's assistance, to hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had bene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Riuers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a further distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith hee ouer-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were imployed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compass, who had been accustomed to the point blanke. By these means did he beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chase with that band of fittie Horse, which being well back with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with troups of the light-armed-shot & slingers, compelled the enemy to lie a-loof.
Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeed the first, of burning the Countrie. With great sorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and therof all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduised to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more sties, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, that being neere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Country, passing ouer some high mountaines which lay be-twene them. This counseil they followed, which could not haue auailed them, if Tissa- phernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENTring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferior to the Greekes's daring, but onely in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skillfull Archers; and vsed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie were of much vse against these poore traouellers, afflicting them in seuen daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betwene the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refused themselves one day, reioicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prooue ealie. But the next morning they saw certaine troups of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leauied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Lonia. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gaue succour to the Rear-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygris; though Ptolomie place them far more to the East vpon the Riuer of Cyru in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riues, Townes and Places mentioned by Xeno- phon) I will not labour to make a coniecture, which may endure the severity of a Criticke.

For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: onely of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much aboute Arsisgarta springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardena in Gor- dene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THE Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fittie or threelcore miles to the heads of the Riuer Tygris, and passing ouer them, traiailed as farre further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the Riuer Telebon, which Xenophon commendeth as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Persian, and was in great fauor with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue been a Schoole where the Art of falsehood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greekes, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, and besetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commandement of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discouered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out, and comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Vauit-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pavilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not farre below the springs thereof, traiailed with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, through which they marched, had their wintering houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattail, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreame cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattail) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countreies bordering vpon the Riuer of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

WITHOUT impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, neere whereunto the people called Phasiati Tauchi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations ioyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes
were

were to passe, made countenance of warre : but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay , making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest ; which caused these people to flye, euery one retreating to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countre the Greekes did enter were the Trachii, who conuaying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattails were taken; the people, to auoid captiuitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rockes, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselves vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattails, which serued to feede them, traualing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but stroakes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions liuing; who were glad, when after seauen dayes iourney they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had bene vexed by these Barbarians. Hence traualing through a good come Countre, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Sythimi, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adioyning, vied them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waltie it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had bene sok into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchis, wherein stands the Citie of Trabizond*, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; for the Armie hauing now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirtie dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Armie began at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosecuted the same purpose.

Having now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-iourneys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedamonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would prouide Vessels to imbarke them. Having thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the slaying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vlie them for their navigation. Left all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vntill willing to giue eare, being desirous to returne by Sea, but the Countrie fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staied to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, nere vnto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faine to imbarke their sicke men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greece Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countrie of the Mosynaci*, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was Cotyora, a Greece Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, hauing neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in conuenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custody of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Campe, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to ioyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meere necessitie had enforced the Army to reach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a methode: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were giuen, they would lend assistance. Vpon this answer the Embassadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cotyora to relieue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the many and great Riuers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halyx, and Parthenius, which crosted their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceiued, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to imbarke euery one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of disension which arose in the Armie; and how it was imbarked.

Hitherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolve and to thaw; by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their seuerall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable worke to build a City in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countre, doining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-layer whom he employed had recieued a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Ariaxerxes would not giue battaile in ten daies: he therefore, hauing preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that hee might freely enioy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions; some approuing the motion, but the greater part reiecting it. They of Sinope and Heracles, being informed of this consultation, were fore afraid, lest the poutie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should giue successe to the project. Which to preuent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon undertooke to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired onely the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and protested openly that hee would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their iourneys end. Silanus the Sooth-layer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from outrunning his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than

flood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Naue whilst they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and saying to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their owne home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Carys, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to haue beene sought, for that the Greeks hauing now their fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxidamus, who promised to giue the Army pay as soone as they came into the parts of Greece.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

HE neuer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make prouision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conueniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose fauour as well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedamonians, who were iealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitiue who forsooke the Army at Trabzond, flying with one of their two ships) or moued by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatened ill successe to his government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedamonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Armie, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing how well their desire, which was by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefoeuer it might be found, without all regard of Friend or Foe. Cherisophus had beene Generall but fixe or seauen dayes, when he was depozed, for hauing bene unwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea which had sent presents to the Campe, and beene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riues, which would haue giuen impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards: whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their prouision would be spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrey, victuals and other necessities could not be had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Acheans, they forsooke immediately to Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captaines, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way betwene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue beene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governor of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the Riuer Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece; for which cause heooke his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confinnes of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatia, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Country to the Propontis. The Mutiners, who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselves into ten Companies, euerie Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrey surprised on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezuous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, onely eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipped at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrey, & finding the Greeks laden with bootie, took the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill wheron they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians & Acheans: who wanting the assistance of horse, & hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand meerey vpon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parly. Whatsoeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Gracia Army, passing along those parts: & receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallats had foolishly throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowre the wayes; the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible; whereby the whole Countrey seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to haue giuen battaile, found that his deuiice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he manauled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed it brake of day, and perceived by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he ouertooke them. They embraced him, and His, with great ioy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to overtake him, and joyne with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disloyne the Armie, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betwene the Lacedaemonians and the Persian.

THE Haven of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and bounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient sea for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some deuise to haue seduced himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to liue at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were enforced to abide in the place till victuals failed; neither would the Capitaines lead them forth to forrage the Countrey, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Aque, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heraclians, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were ioyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Cornell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood nere at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrey lying in wait to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnibazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinians, Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroad in seeking bootie, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that suruiued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessities, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this journey his demeanour was very honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adioyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them, from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victuals to sustaine them in the place, and ships, to carrie them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the vneafe returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to win to vnto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by which he might flye from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Phrygians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrey forthwith, remouing their Families, and leaving all that could not sodainly be conueighed away.

to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enioy the spoile of the Countrey, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they took a great bootie, which they carried away to Chrysopolis, a Citie nere vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnibazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, lest their long stay in that Countrey might breed in them a desire to visite his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedaemonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to giue the Souldiers pay, as soone as they arrived at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Riuers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their liues to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his inurious dealings, they seized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophons persuasion they forbore to sacke, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vnderaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedaemonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedaemonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countreies of Asia. For the Townes of Ionis, which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedaemonians to lend them aide, whereby to recover their libertie, and obtained their request. For a power was sent ouer, vnder conduct of Timbroa a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Townes as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilst they were managed by the Lacedaemonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedaemonians tooke courage by example of Xenophons Armie, to make warre vpon Artaxerxes.

IT seemed that the Lacedaemonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient to take care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reuealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiaticques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreame disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of vnder-taking vpon this huge vnweildie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the ioynt forces forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeere and three moneths. Neuertheless the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedaemonians, to the defence of their owne Estate; leauing it questionable, whether Agessilaus, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeeres, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons owne iourney, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Canon the Briton with sixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countreie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agessilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

Thimbro receiuing Xenophons men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had bene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernement of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low Countries of Asia was diuided betwene Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Coriuall thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Asia, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Prouince in few dayes, he brought into his owne power.

That Countreie of Asia had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bene Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaued her selfe so well, that she not onely was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest of certaine Townes adjoining, and sundry times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Asians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great seruice. But somewhat before the arrivall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stile her, and kill her sonne of seateene yeeres old; which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue bene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely reiected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driven into tearmes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Towne stood out foure dayes (against the will will of the Citizens, who were couetous of liberty) the Gouernour struing in vaine to haue kept it to the vse of Pharnabazus. Now remained onely two Cities, Gergehe and Seppis, which the Traitor held, who fearing all men, as being loosed of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leaue to sp.ake with him, and pledges for his securitie: vpon the deliuey of which he issued out of Seppis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to ioyne with the Greekes vpon such conditions, as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to let the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently vpon these words they marched toward Seppis. When Midias perceived that it was in vaine to strue ag.inst the Armie, and the Towne-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergehe. Midias did not forsake his Companie, but followed him, earnestly intreating that he might be suffered to retaine Gergehe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had benee subiect to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end heooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the necke of Land ioyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth, by which meanes cleauen Towns with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians; and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well fortified with prouision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the seate of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vncauie to recouer all the Townes of Ionis; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yeerely Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his priuate enemie Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne doores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuer of Mander, and not looking to haue bin so soone encountered, marched carelesly through the Countreie: when on the very sodaine the whole Armie of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discouered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in aduantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly disclose by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had bene followed, who perceiving the opportunitie of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parley; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, so last vntill Tissaphernes might receiue answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their owne libertie and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedemonians should depart Asia, and leaue the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; onely it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finish by trial of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedemonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontent of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedemonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces received by them during the late warres, when leisure was wanting to the requitall of such petite injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine vpon the Citie of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnities; and publicly whipt one of them, that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindered Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vsed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge; and therefore sent a peremptorie message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertie the Citie which they held in subiection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than mere Vassils of the Lacedemonians. In their late warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeeres together they sent an Armie into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first yeere an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeere, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enjoy their libertie, and to haue her owne wals throwne downe. Onely the Presidentship of the Olympique games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vsu modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assistant to the Lacedemonians, excepting the Corinthians and Baotians, whose aide hauing bene of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta: it selfe, they could not smooother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victory; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece: to Thebes, and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weales to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IIII.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the warre diuerted into another Prouince, through persuasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successeur. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to ioyne with that of Dercylidas, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Baotia, a Hauen, lying opposit to the Iland of Eubaea; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers; they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrey in a new warre; therefore waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his minde to intendment. Hauing landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greece Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, onely to win time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Ariaxerxes, whilst Agesilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate Citie on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming downe of these forces which Ariaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plaine message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by perurie deserved vengeance from Heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betwene him and Caria, that they should prouide victuals and other necessaries for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleue, that his intent was to invade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vaile for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plains of Meander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heauie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrey which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoyle without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight onely twelue men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes hauing enabled himselfe, whilst winter lasted he entred vpon the Countrey of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, and not onely tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without assistance of their infanterie, he gaue them battaile, and had a great victory, taking their Campe in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he most desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succede him in the government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perurie he could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisdom, euen in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supposing posing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greekes, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in this time of danger, yet would he much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such means whereby the danger it selfe might haue bene auoided: as not loosing to haue warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the counse which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agessilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had bene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enioy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie beforewith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agessilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transerre the warre into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offense and on the defense part. For Agessilaus hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbeare his feuerall Provinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne gouernement could be preserved free from warte and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribeto nothing so desferuely, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsual that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Proouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrey giuen in charge vnto each of them, receiued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sat still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by ioyning their forces, it had not bene vnease to recompence the spoile of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from fure greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treatie betweene Agessilaus and Pharnabazus.

Agessilaus hauing thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrey without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious then profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might haue increased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad tearmes with the great King, whom he lost againe as easily, by means of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vnease to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had bene so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his loue (which had bene such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their flect when it was driuen to runne a-shore at Alydam, aduentured to ride into the Seas as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-backe against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer bene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwife then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agessilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would resolt from the King to them, they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrey wherein he was at that time onely Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy, if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agessilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessary businesse elsewhere; but because his Countrey would yeeld great bootie, and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their vnthankfulnesse with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hyred with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agessilaus meant nothing lesse then to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wise course whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driuen to looke to her owne, and gae ouer her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had bene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territorie. He sent into Greece fiftie talents of siluer, to be employed in raising warre against the Lacedemonians; which treasure was, by the subtile practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise disperfed among the principall men of the Thebans, Argiues, and Corinthians, that all those Estates hauing formerly borne seuerall hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open warre. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint, and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Laerians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had iradiudged vnto them, and receiued yeerely money for it. This money the Laerians were either hirred or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne, which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an inuasion made vpon Phocia, wasting that Countrey in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betweene Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, bene concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their suite; it being the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deserre the acknowledgement of iniuries receiued, vntill occasion of reuenge were offered, and then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wils, hauing no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countreys about Phocia, and with such forces as he could leaue, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta; (for Sparta, as hath bene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to resolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who resolted to assist him in that enterprize) meaning to ioyne with Lysander, & make a speedy end of the warre. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, for as much as their owne strength was farre too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not unknowne to them, that many followers of the Lacedamonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in countenance; but the good willes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did dar that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course, to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompensed with friendship lately shewne in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirty Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasybulus, and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had beene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requittall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not onely refuse to aide the Lacedamonians in this Warre; but that it should assit the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates, Lysander being desirous to doe somewhat that might aduance the businesse in hand, came to Halimna, where, though Pausanias did not meet him, as had beene appointed, yet beate out the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreame danger; but their spirits were soone reuiued by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territories; for which, either cowardise or indifferencie, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driuen to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banishment.

How Agesilaus was called out of Asia to helpe his Countrey. A victorie of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedamonian fleet; recouers the maserie of the Seas; and rebuilds the wals of Athens.

HIS good successe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argines, Corinthians, Eubaeans, Locrians, and Acarnanians, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Armie, determined to give battaile to the Lacedamonians as neere as they might, to their owne doores; Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the aduocation of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the Streights of Hellepont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had giuen battaile to the Lacedamonians, and the remainder of their Associates, but with ill successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argines and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedamonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedamonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Agesilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent ouer into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure seene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeour had brought the Athenians into order, by aduancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedamonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the City was despoiled of her olde reputation, & scarcely able to maintaine an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it impoised the King his Master, to haue the Greeks diuided into such factions, as might utterly disable them from vndertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broyles, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seeke peace by entreaty and commemoration of old benefits at their hands, who vnprouoked had sold his loue for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprized by Lysander at Egos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he requited the losse receiued at Egos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedamonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, to strong a Navy, and so much golde, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walles, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signiory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Offspring small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedamonians lose all in Asia; The Athenians recouer some part of their old Dominion.

Euerthelesse the Lacedamonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeeres the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agesilaus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He wasted Saonia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouer-threw; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrey of Locris: which done, hee returned home.

The gaine of these victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battaile of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposit vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesilaus charged them in the returne from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians, and some other exploits by the Lacedamonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with quall damage receiued in the parts adioyning; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recouered. The variety of which enterfeats was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawne by the losse of the haven of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian-forces at Lechaum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willed to doe their message, required onely in seorne, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while onely by incursions, wherein the Atheans, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, vntill Agesilaus repayed these inuaders with equal, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanians, that they were driuen to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived, that the Lacedamonians were not onely intangled in an hard warre at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, hauing lost their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gaue eare to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vse their owne lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Go-vetnours. Onely the City of Abidus did stand firme, wherein Dercylidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Townes about Hellepont, in the alliance of the Lacedamonians, which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasybulus took in Byzantium, Chalcidion, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceiue how vnease a thing it would be, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not onely to renounce the Greekes inhabiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and euery Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Countrey would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrey being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensive warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to giue all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weak, than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe ioyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their seuerall Embassadours oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himselfe to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agesilanus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Timbro was sent into Asia to make warre vpon Struthas, and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land, grew almost to the manner of piracie and robbrie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Timbro was slaine by Struthas, & in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dircyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasylbulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprisid and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasylbulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Aspendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before ioyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Gouvernement of a few the principall Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraigntie into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the Towne of their Confederates a Gouvernement like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Argina roused vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Argina, and besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Ilanders began a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirtie. The losse of these ships was soone recompen- sed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Argina, whereupon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athens, hauing but newly raised her walls, hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land; but onely depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the eye of Pyrræus, had abilitie to vex the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weaning of that Citie did cause it usually to embrace more then it could compasse, so the insolency and shamelesse iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves farre out of sight, and to seeke employments at such distance distance as might secure them from the eyes of the enuious, & from publike iudgements, out of which, few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias how did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrey well could haue spared: with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt, whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though his honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careless of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Haue. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Gouvernour of Argina, conceived a strong hope of surprising the Naue of Athens, as it lay in Piræus, thinking a right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleepe in their Cabins, or drinking in Tavernes. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entering at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which meanes hee took many ships laden with merchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessells, also three or foure Gallies; hauing sunke or broken, and made vnserviceable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia, by whose assistance the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellespont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Countrey into as many seuerall States as were petty Boroughes in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controuersies betwene the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbrius, and Scirus bee subject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, vpon them the approouers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates; and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end, that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking vpon themselves the execution, did not onely compell the Argiues to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Boeotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended vnder the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Mantinians to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleging that they had formerly beene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as hauing beene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By these conquests the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their liberties; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would bee vnable to make opposition.

The warre which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason, and Olynthus by famine.

Next these Warres, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mighty, that shee did not onely command her Neighbour Townes, but was also become terrible to places farre remooued, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, Olynthians, who following the vsuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at libertie the places ouer which King Aminias did tyrannize, had almost now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Scanthus and of Apollonia, being neereft vnto the danger of those incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should giue it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did found of compulsion: protesting that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become subject vnto her, and fight in her defence. Heereupon was made a hastie leuie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gave such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Armie following them, surprized the Citadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phæbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the illuerie of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them, which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phæbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment: In conclusion, profit to farre ouer-weighed honesty, that the deede was approoued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This success of power hauing strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe vnto their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Thebans recovered their libertie, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garrison.

After this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeeres, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a meane to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meane to others to do the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, coming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better then it did those who for feare of it were fledde from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betweene these two, that soone found very good success, being managed thus. Seauen of the banished men forsooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next dry feuerly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and so passed vndiscovered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawn into the conspiracie. The day following, a solempne feast being then held in the Citie, Phylidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustfull men, that he would conuincen vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, vnlesse they would dismisse their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, would not endure that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Governours loose behauiour, slew them all vpon the sodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours vpon businessse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prison, slew the Gaoler, and set at libertie such as they thought meet, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Capitaine of the Castle hearing the sodaine Proclamation, thought the Rebels to bee stronger then indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discouer such, as would be forward vpon occasion of reuolting. But as soon as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troupes coming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not onely make speed to assist their Countymen, but procured some Athenians to ioyne with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yielded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Capitaine at Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the success arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bene taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vltured by them, restored to her owne libertie: Leontus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers, with a toilsome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thebes, to infect the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Haven of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the Countrie adioyning, and draue away Cattell, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra, to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens ioyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, euen by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient ouer-weening men, it selfe failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vniually expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phæbidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias, who howeuer Agefilas did spoyle the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good success of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, laying to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian Warre: to surround Peloponnesus with a Naule; afflicting to the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bene very likely: that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good end, which neuerthelesse, being persecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day vpon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had bene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affaires of of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Amalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre, to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who understood farre better than his Countymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedamonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Baotians; Agessilaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leaue the Baotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by letting the Laconians free, for that the Signorie of Baotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken, but was heard with no patience: For Agessilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne backe out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to achieve by the Persian war, did now passionately vrge that point of setting the Baotians at libertie, & finding it as obstinately refused, hee dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocia, who receiued command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which hee did, and was there slaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance fore-going it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (betweene which and the conclusion of the generall peacethere passed but twentie daies) the Lacedamonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerlie made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Baotia, did now begin to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threecore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly endured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffning that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, stretchines, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took vpon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territories of Lacedamon.

The Athenians, refusing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedamonians, did neuertheless finely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agessilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrells that might arise) had left vnperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Cities confederated at Athens, where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raise their towne, rectifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedamonians, some to weaken & keepe them low, yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedamonians durst not giue impediment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agessilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Euboeans, and many others; with the power of which Countreies they entered Peloponnesus in fauour of the Arcadians, who had, vpon expectation of their coming, abstained from giuing battaile to Agessilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas ioyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was invaded & spoyled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeeres were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeeres were past, since all Greece was in the deuotion of the Spartans; but now the Region to which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon; nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, sauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedamonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preferue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Healotes or Slaves as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, & somewhat pitiuously entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth & some Townes of Peloponnesus they receiued speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, having re-built the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, whom the Lacedamonians many ages before had chased away to other Countreies, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe invade and spoyl Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

His iourneie therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence; but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generalls by Land. This had bene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of the two Cities; but it was reiected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no make or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue serued vnder the Lacedamonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedamonians other five, and so successiually that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessity be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnble to impeach them, that hauing fortified Isthmus from Seato Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societes, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferior to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldieriship, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernment, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatnesse they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they beganne to demeanne themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbors, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing bene made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedamonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were overthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persians; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoever they tooke in hand, and were become not onely victorious ouer the Lacedemonians, but patrons ouer the Thessalonians, and moderators of the great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadours the great and famous Capitaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedemonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of Warre to Sea; onely the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many weightie considerations resolute, to binde the Thebans firmly vnto him; iustly expecting, that their greatnesse should be on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne; and hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persians to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundry grieuous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greekes, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not vnlkely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprize, had not they bene empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discovered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens: And finally, hauing offered much contumelie to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good seruings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlkely to looke abroade; whereupon if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haven townes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing liberty to all Cities that had at any time bene free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meanes which the Greekes had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece bene so composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest haue transported an Armie, to assist the reuolting Satrapes, or Viceroyes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phoenicia; humane reason can hardly finde the meanes, by which the Empire could haue bene preferred from that ruine, which the diuine Councell had deferred vnto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Prouinces, wanting ting a firme body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space dissolued and vanishing like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiaticques wearied quickly with the troubles and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeem: the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withall his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important, but for that it was like a sudden storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly layed downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Egypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse iourney against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention; much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enioyed the pleasures which an Empire to great and wealthy could afford vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were onely or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Persia to the Queene-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had bene the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by payson and mischieuous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, she therefore the wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, churishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the perswasion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine: That his owne will was the supreme law of his subiect, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adiudged to be good or euill. In this imaginative happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadours of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence onely could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie laied vpon mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hercof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had bene concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controuersies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece, when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe; a dilatorie answer was made by the Embassadours, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles; not to swear vnto them. Herby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to requere the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappoynting the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse; but left them as it found them to relie vpon their owne swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was diuided, betwene the Athenians and Lacedemonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon the enemie of the others greatnesse drawne all their followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrey, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits receiued, or in dislike dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, & many victories in few yeeres had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty in dependants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of mere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her coniunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had beene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought they themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were faine vnder them in valour, hauing beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly ioyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wauering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, & seemed no litle to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuerthelesse accept this new Confederacy, nor relinquishing the old, because they found that, howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedemonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay, the coming of Epaminondas, who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Isthmus, and had bene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of employing it to publike vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countreymen, as people desirous of innouation. This was done: but the vproare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much ado scarce pacified. When complaint of the Capitaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mighty a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Herevpon such of them as had before sought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrey, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forthwith send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them, as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedemonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had beene accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerful Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now very gently yeelde to the Arcadians, that the

the command of the Army in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Erraine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemeta, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie coming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedemonian Capitaines to fortifie Manitinae with all diligence, and to send for Agefilas to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hasty aduertisement of his purpose to Agefilas, who was then well onward in the way to Manitinae, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly beene taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agefilas in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arriuall of the Lacedemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Manitinae. It was the time of Haruest, which made it very likely, that the Manitinaeans, finding the warre to be carried from their walls into another quarter, would vse the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whilst no enemy was neere that might empcach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Manitinae, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Manitinaeans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrey; farre more intent vpon their haruest-businesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recover the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should haue taken all their prouision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-decreely beene redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Manitinae, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger wherein they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous aduerture to deliuer those who otherwise were giuen as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good fellowship had alwayes beene giuen to the Thessalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but onely in desire of relieuing her distressed friends, they illud forth of Manitinae, nor abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meate; and giuing a lustie charge vpon the enemy, who as brauely receiued them, after a long and hot fight, they remained masters of the field, giuing by this victory a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Boeotians arriued in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedemonians and their Assilants were not faine behinde.

Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprisng Sparta and Mantinea, having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnefians, would looſevanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorabile character of his expedition; resolued to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leaue the Spartians as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subiection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion decieued him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sodaine danger, the enemie ran to Armes, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that dayes seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedamonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedamonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Achaens, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the body of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedamonians, having by them the Arcadians; the Eubzans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messeniens, and Theffalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, onely a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could ioyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were ouer-laid with numbers, and so beate vpon by Theffalian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies of foot, which had bene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turne backe, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came vpo to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With more greater violence did the Lacedamonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victory to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedamonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeeres, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffnesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foot of ground: taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleaue the whole battaile in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans.

who may iustly be said to haue carried the victory, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, having driuen the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was allaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victory was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and serued merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowess. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemonian Squadron, and forced it to giue backe in disorder, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Company of the Spartians, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, henceforth with a singular courage maintained the fight, vsing against the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he receiued so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breast. Hereupon he sunke downe, and was soone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall somewhat animated the Spartians (who faine would haue got his body,) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trouble of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawne out of his body, he must needs dye. Hearing this, he called for his shield, which to haue lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victory; answer was made, that the Boeotians had won the field. Then said he, It is faire time for me to dye, and withall sent for Solidar, and Diophanes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, Hee aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilst with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his body; comfortng his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two faire Daughters, in whom his memory should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrey: for he equalled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wiſedome, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warriour, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Indultrious, and a Proud Captain. Neither was his priuate Conuersation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroad. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Courteous, resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular case, and of much mildnesse: a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, & very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophy and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer more been an vnbeling, a dreadfull reputation among all people aduoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinea. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

His battaile of Mantinea was the greatest that had euer beene fought in that Countie betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platae, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Graecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were vnderaken against foraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interested, prouing for moreable Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath beene related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, euery one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedaemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindered not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Countie, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by foraine employment in Egypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrtas of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nethus, hauing retained the Countie, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and foraine inuasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not onely to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue beene, had it not fallen by Domestickall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Neitanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebelle with that Armie which the money of Tachos had waged. This fallhood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his owne Countie; though it seeme rather, that he grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainment; and Neitanebus (who seemes to haue bene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vp another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, prevailed so farre, that he left Neitanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie sailed homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from couctousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euery one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. He was neuerthelessse very arrogant, peruerse, vniust and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne, with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessity to grow war-like, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great, whose actions (the solemne grauity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other, some quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and medled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like: Each of them was the last great Capitaine which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Countrey by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was neerer then the equality. Indeede the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cesar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Government only being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forfeited vnto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the

Signiorie, and ancient renownt of Sparta was presently lost, and the freedome of all Greece

being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soone, vpon the death of Agesilaus, giue vp the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countie was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great,
King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

He Philes, of whom we have already made large discourse, nor as yet wearied with intestine Warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superiority, doe still as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other. Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, their defended their libertie, with as happy success as euer Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath euer been acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a tryall and experience, more then fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatfoeuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellepont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of mark in the world, that they vnderfall, and perish, by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greekes. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in deuouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Gracians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover, recover their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when giting Riuters are once swollen, fast-running, and enraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood betwene them and this inundation, than seek to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Gracia Ciuitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium vniuersis perdidit; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Isapiter and Aethna, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Thyrians; and on the South and South-west, by the Thessalians and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some fixe yeeres after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to leade a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Country, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, halting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle bene directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should encounter him, or sate before him, He pursued these Goates to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entered their Citie without resistance, and possessed it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeeres. Carnus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue yeeres. Tyrinus followed Carnus, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrinus, gouerned one and fiftie yeeres: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinius, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Amiobennus, and others affirme, that he appoynted a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Agia: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay vpon their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the great failed; therefore the posteritie of the Temenida failed in him: a thing rather deuiled after the effect, as I conceiue, then fore-told by Perdiccas.

Argaeus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Philip the first, his successour, reigned eight and twentie yeeres.

Enropus followed Philip, and gouerned six and twentie yeeres: in whose infancie the Thyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their nation could not be beaten (their King being present,) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimanius of Clotarius the sonne of Fredogunda.

Alcetas succeeded Enropus, and ruled nine and twentie yeeres.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fiftie yeeres; He liued at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yielding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successour.

Alexander, surnamed the Rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and

fortie yeeres: He did not onely appease the wrath of Allegabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giuing Cygnus his Sister, and Barbarus of the bloud of Persia, but by that match hee grew to great in Xerxes graces, as hee obtained all that Region betwene the Mountaines of Olympus and Himnus, to be vnitd to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie, Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sonnes, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and reigned in all eight and twentie yeeres. The Warres which he made were not much remarkable: the storie of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six bookes. He left behind him two sonnes, Perdiccas, who was very yong, and Archelaus, who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seuen yeeres of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who exculing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for hauing thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Vncle Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alcetas, his Cosen Germaine, & enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeeres.

Plut. in Corp.
Arif. in Vol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all meanes to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honored Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing reigned seuen yeeres, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose by Cratesus.

Orestes his younger sonne was committed to the education of Æropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill, for Æropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which hee held some five yeeres: the same who denied passage to Agessilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Dir. Polyen.
Plut. in Demetri.

This Vsurper left three sonnes, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and hauing reigned one yeere, hee was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the sort of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alcetas, and his sonne Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very vnquietly) foure and twentie yeeres; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus, incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two yeeres dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbors neare the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second; Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: Hee had also by his second Wife Cygnus, three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Aloris, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much about one yeere, in which time he was inuaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while hee was at that time about Amphipoli. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of money) to leaue his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subiectd his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being inuited by the Aleuada against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, hauing redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey; with whom hee also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother failing in loue with her Sonne-in-law; who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeeres, but was soone after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledge; and sayth, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conueyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet liuing) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Daughter

Perdiccas the third, after hee had slaine Alorites his base brother, gouerned Macedon five yeeres, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus, but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander did.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

Philip the second, the youngest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, having beene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had vnder Epaminondas; making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first yeere of the hundred and fifti Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred foure and thirte yeeres; and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was enuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a sonne; though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouer-grew his modestie, and hee was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall, the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Pausanias, the Athenians, Argæus, sonnes of the late Vsurper Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, hee bought off the weightiest by money, and by faire promises vnloadd himselfe of so many of the rest, as hee ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land vnder Manias, did beate vpon him on all sides and quarters of his Countrey: Yet after he had practised the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts, and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, hee forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, hee prevented their recouerie of Amphipoli, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argæus the sonne of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retreat from Æges, that hee forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus lost, hauing the greatest part of his Army slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remaind vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoyding thereby the present furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betwene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this element hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good success which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leisure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with so prosperous success, as he slew Baradilus, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannania, he pierst that Country, and after a maine victory obtained, he enforst them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he halted speedily towards Larissa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Thessalie, of which Towne he soone made himselfe master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made vse in time following. Now although he resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet hee thought it most for his safety to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least while he invaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or ouer-runne Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Sirmon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus), and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which greatly to the aduancement of Philips affaires, he drew ycerely a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enioy it, or their owne Estate, many yeeres.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the City of Pheres in Thessalie, from the tyrants Lycophron and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for-ouer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, bindeth them to his seruice.

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew Philip into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second yeere of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeeres after the battaile of Maninea, and about the eighth yeere of Alexander Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur towards the execution of eternall providence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengfull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrans, conceiued against the Phocians, not onely teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves, beating downe their owne defenses, to giue him an ealie passage; and beating themselves, to giue him victory without perill, lest nothing vnperformed towards their owne slavery, sauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians; and for refusal were exposed as Sacrilegious, and accused to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philemelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazzard that Casár after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance.

chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beate out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worfe could not befall them than already was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to preuaile against all that had commiſſion to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, wastenue thousand talents, which in those dayes serued them to wage a great many men; and such was their success in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrans; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philemelus cast himselfe head-long ouer the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendered themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That hee that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philippus, After to Philip, for so hee was called that gaue him the wound. This Citie he euened with the foile.

Phoc. v. b. m. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians ingaged in the holy warre, entred Thessalie with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philemelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped so to entertaine the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called in to Thessalie, but both the Thessalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being present) were vterly ouertrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Boeotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Boeotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misadventure, after hee had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all speed into Thessalie, there to find againe the honour which hee lately lost: and was the second time encountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not, for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, fixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed along the coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that rooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Thessalie, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious praclises of Philip.

From hence Philip resolved to invade Phocia it selfe, but the Athenians did not saour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedaemonians, they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylae. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Aticyberne, Torone, and other Townes, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before hee had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had ouermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas was three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygæa: but Philips elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two yonger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Iustine affirmeth. But iust quarrels are ballanced by iust Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might serue his turneall his affections, & passions, how diuers soeuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and therein conuered.

For

For he neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie; he esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter: Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subiection. And because he thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power he had within their owne walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere he late downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrie and Common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the inhabitants for slaues by the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver speeres: Whereupon Horace well and truly said,

Diffidit Vrbiū
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit amulos Reges muneribus.

By gifts the Macedon claue gates asunder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude, then he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain:) So when in the contention betweene the Competitors, for the kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Counsell accompanied with Pietie and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie, and hauing beatte and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian Warre.

He warre still continued betweene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Boeotians, finding themselves vnable to subsist without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waite the strength of Greece. They also sent to Antaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes; but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Boeotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assit them in person, to whom they would giue an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandements in Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Boeotia, where being arrived, Phallemus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leauing the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour; and for conclusion he had the glorie of that warre called Sacred, which the Gracians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten yeeres; and besides the glorie, he posselt himselfe of Orchomene, Corone, and Corisa, in the Countrey of the Boeotians, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themselves. He brought the Phocians into seruitude, & wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reseruing vnto himselfe the yerely tribute of threecore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pietie for seruice of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Council of the Am-

phicenses which the Phocians had, with the superiendencie of the Pythian games, for: sated by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacriledge.

How Philip with ill success attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant returre into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Ae- lie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardanians; and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians staied his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength; and a people resolu'd to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip late downe before it with a pittifull Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults; built many out topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repell'd with equall violence: For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to wearle them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were reliev'd from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoever was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gaue them often and ready helpe; Philip removed the one halfe of his Armie and besieged it, leauing fiftene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnderake diuers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions; Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusal. In the meane while, Philip hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threecore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also vnprofperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Masla set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battaile of Cheronea, was chosen Captaine-General of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among these Northern Nations (part of which he suppress, and part quieted) he spent some eight yeeres; and in the ninth yeere, after the end of the holy warre, he was by his great aduantage inuited againe by the Greeks to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphictones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Lacrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphicenses, the rest were not of themselves able to constraine them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resolu'ing vpon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe, nor other dissuasion than a mustering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Thessaly, Thessalonica, and brought into subiection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this storme would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice of drawing downe the Thebans to ioyne with them, to see the enioying of their effects.

estates and their freedom to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orator's eloquence cost them dear: It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat vnto them (with words mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phaon they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed: his much as, when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although some thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like sumber well-neere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthie men on that side to holde vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip to shining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations intricacies) into Persia, India, and Aegypt; so it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Gracian glory: Yea their libertie (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion wonne with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer loft.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disadvantage) to the ende hee might obtaine the Soueraignetie over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-General against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheroneas, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epinondas triumphed over the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Corinth, siled the first Commander of all the Gracians; and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellefont into Asia, to begin the warre. Of his enterprize against Persia, hee sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he receiued such another conuertible riddle, as Craesus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

Bur as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philip ambitious desire to inuade Persia, abuse his iudgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatned, he vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and pastimes therat appointed, hee inuited all his Friends, and Alleis, with the principall persons of the Gracian Cities, from whom hee receiued much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe iustice to one Pausanias a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to be carnally abused by diuers base persons; This Pausanias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partiality in so soule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued fixe and some yceres, and reigned fixe and twenty. Iustine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly auowed, by the honor shee did vnto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip.
Of his laudable qualities, and issue.

Now although he were then taken from the World, when hee had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seene the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here herein happy that he liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse hee had laid so soundly for him, with so plain a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recovery of Macedonia itselfe, in competition betwene him and the sonnes of Aropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places possessed by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northren Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom, and the subiection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; He left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and iudgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that wore a Crowne. For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, mightily murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio neuer did any thing worthy of remembrance; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Spirit of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superior to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to iudge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent Education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, hee had this fauour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to supplesthem. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Arcandus and Nicanor; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; He answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to be well spoken off; and this was shortly proved, for after Philip relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to violence, that he was a better Phisition for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembered to Cicero, and Gellius; and by Di-Cic. Off. 1. c. 1. §. 2. 1. on; and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polye-Polye. 2. de Re. 1. 1. um and Frontinus, his wise sayings by Plutarch; And albeit he held Macedonia as in his owne right, all the time of his reigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amintas the sonne of his brother Perdiccas (of whom hee had the protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amintas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's base sonne Aridaus, her Vncle by the Mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philip's first Wife, and mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridaus by extreme torments: Eurydice he strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neopolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audax, an Illyrian, his second Wife, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicanopolis, the Sister of Iason, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had Thesalonica, whom Cassander after hee had taken Pidna, married, but she was afterward by her Father-in-law Antigonator put to death.

By Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus, hee had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, O. Athen. L. 12. c. 2. 1. §. 1. 2. lympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rotted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra hee had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Phila and Meda hee had no issue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Arfinoe, whom after hee had gotten with childe, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolemy, King of Aegypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philitina, his second Concubine, a pub-

a publike Dancer, hee had Aridans, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

§. I.

A briefe rehearsal of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Asia.

Alexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father, being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sort of Learning and good Arts. He began his reigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuentene yeeres after Rome built, and after his owne birth twenty yeeres. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three fewell victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbor-Nations, whom Philip had opprest, began to consult about the recovery of their former liberty, and to aduerture it by force of Armes. Alexanders young yeeres gaue them hope of preuailing, and his suspected severity increased courage in those, who could better resolute to die, than to liue slavishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his Estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe, & the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their seruice in his Warres; and vsed such kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young yeeres, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, hee made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirit among them, as by the Councill of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Capitaine-Generall against the Persians, vpon which warre Philip had not onely resolutely, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmentio, and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shor at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hatefull. But a contrary wind arriued; for he receiued aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Macedonians, had vnited themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia; the deuce he vsed was more subtiler then profitable, for hee caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a daies defined by falshood and knauery) that deuiled rumors & lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Vicers of such trumperie, and for them, feare vpon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Grecians, of whose assistance he thought himselfe assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to striue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Poit which he purposeth to recover: and it no lesse becometh the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

Hetherfore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all Traggers, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be receiued againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resoluing; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wise men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once; not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And hauing now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolutely assured those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Tracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Asians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not onely other of his Predecessours, but euén Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, he made peace, or else brought them into subiection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Greekes had enioyed it ouer-long, and so lott too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hastneth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, & three thousand horse, before the Citie, & gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolute, being euén heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeed; he was to draw blood of the Grecians, by whom he hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would onely deliuer into his hands Phanix and Prothytes, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Prouinces, could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailable, they were charged at the backe by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaues, at the price of foure hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Grecian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleodas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forebear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to belieue that they were rather misse-led by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being periwaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. He also brought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoetes, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him remitted, he threatened to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second reuolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betook themselves to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he inuaded.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians vpon the River of Granicke.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Anipax, both Greece & Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being ready to disimbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, & five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neere vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his owne coast, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not sparing such of his owne as he suspected. He also tooke with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted, thinking by vniust crueltie to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iustice of God; for al that he had planned, was soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which he wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intituled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinlman of the gods) he gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander aliue, whip him with rods, and then conuay him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Aethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians; But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their upper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they they onely then obeyed, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did lustily and violently require it. For saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prelium metu, ita format in doctus; nam sciendum est in pugna usum amplius prodesse quam vires; A well-traitised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must consider, that in fight it more awaileth to haue beene accustomed vnto the like, than onely to haue strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his storie, that it was hard to iudge, whether his daring to vndertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which seuereth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuel of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the backe, in running away, than hurt in the bolosmes by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates, and Rhifaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body vpon a peece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foot-men, and two and twenty Horse-men?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granicke.

When the winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone haue perswaded themselves, that such an enemy vpon equall teames and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machianels counsell, that he which resolued to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italia? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such, as to speake briefly, afflicke with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no security to those that lye behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lombardie perswaded themselves that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a seruice, were busied in custodie of the Alpes, Francis appeared in Lombardie, to so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrival. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such sort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyle, haue seldom beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldom (if euer) have they beene attempted in vaine? Xerxes and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopyle.

Thermopylae, Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open, how strongly fouer they had been locked and barred, yet were those Countreys open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Riuer how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witness. The deepest haue many Fords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates. In case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by struuing in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their means of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a Riuer were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had bene safe enough against the Romans, invading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, & not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the fords. Wherby he so amazed the enemy attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleueing nothing could be hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the land. Yet the Britaines were men stout enough, the Perfians were very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the Riuer of Granike in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer means. For hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magneſia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, he receiued with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their owne lawes. For he obserued it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus citius clementia summa; It is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Souerainty, to haue the same of being mercifull. He then by Parmentio vnder Miletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which he, as it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Cari, where Ada the Queene, who had bene cast out of all that the held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her sonne and successeur; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Iycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius, who was faine to be aduanced towards him with a marvellous Armie by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victory layd vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the government and settling of Iycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Capitaines in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas seated on the Riuer Alexander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regall-seate in former times, of King Atidas. In this City it was that he found the Gordium-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, he cut it a funder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophetic did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophetic, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Perfians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge wherof he committed vnto two of his Capitaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent three score Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Anguor, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Armie, and then then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves vnto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arriued.

Here he vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which hartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this onely Capitaine he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vnderaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conuerted the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimities, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue bene stirred vp in sundry Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Princerpall, piercing, mouing, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were marvellous, and would hardly haue bene vnderaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discovered the Riuer of Indus: as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountered by an equal spirit, concurring with equal power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, then desert places, and the meere length of tedious iourneys could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact paterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encouraging worthy Capitaines, and those better followed than themselves, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldom liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equal forces of one hardy & well-ordered State, than to tread down and vterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the body of a grosse vnweildie Empire. Wherefore these Purus Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnes concurring to seldom, that I can finde no instance of both in one, saue onely that braue Roman, Cæsar.

Hauing thus farre digressed, it is now time that we returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror, who is trauieling hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Perfian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile, vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well aduised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaires in the Warres, as he doth of the spoiles, shall neuer be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often fauour themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defensible; and withall, as Cartius noteth, he began ouer-late to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to waste all the prouisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, & alwayes to giue ground to the Inuader, till he found some such notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes sleeping themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countreies. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, hee might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdome. Pericles, though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the invaded ought euermore to fight vpon the advantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their owne countreies, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when he gaue Casir ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound iudgement, that those Counsils which promise surtie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by wasting the Countreie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolue the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Zeigers, contrary to the aduice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, invading their Countreie, and could not be perswaded to linger the time; and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon King Edward at Chessey; and King John (when the English were well-nere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue bene wasted to nothing) constrained the blacke Prince with great furie, nere Poitiers, to ioyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the first of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed his aduice which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smooke; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-liued, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice. The course which Attemon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand stilla while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia bene defended by Arsenes, Gouvernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bene maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue bene so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue bene broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull trauaile.

But Arsenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste and spoile the Countreie, or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather haue aduentured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would would haue bene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsenes made all haste to ioyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countreie behind their backs, had exposed themselves vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countreie (which honour they saw that Arsenes himselfe could well forbear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Haruest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardice of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had bene alienated from the Persian side by their perfidion.

§. IIII.

Of the vnrarlike Armie leuied by Darius against Alexander. The vnrarlike courses which Darius took in this Expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

IN the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetie thousand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iustine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glorie and riches, than to provide for his owne safety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threecore and fise yong-men, answering the number of the daies of the yeere, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-laid and garnished with silver and gold; and then the Vanguard of their horse, compounded of twelue severall Nations, which the better to auoid confusion, did hardly vnderstand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortal, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chaines of gold, & their coates with the same metall imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearle, baies, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incuilitie to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuosè inductus miles, se virtute superiorem alius non existimet, cum in praelijs oportet fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that he exceedeth these in colour, whom hee exceedeth in garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Sannites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all swarc cyther to preuaile or die, thirty thousand of them hauing apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per pilla atque aurata scutula transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pike would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to brede the more terror) & these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinmen. Then came Darius himselfe, himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serue, but they serued their turnes of these, by changing their maske-bodies into thin portable and currant coyne. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius sat, had a couering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to imbrew in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beautie. Hee had for the proper Guard of his owne person, two hundred of the blood Royall, bloud too Royall and precious to bee spilt by any valorous aduerture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to haue vsed, hee would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rereaward, the same being led by Sisygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fiftene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betwene these and a company of light-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on sixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the Maygame-King into the field, incumbered with a most vnnecessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part to effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue encouraged the nakedest Nation of the world against them. Wee finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimity, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoeuer else hath bene wont to moue and encourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of spoyle and riches. The rich ships are boarded vpon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nation haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royalls of plate, and Pistols; which, had they bene put to it vpon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countrey, they would haue turned their Pecces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had bene brought without reason to the Butchery & slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good success, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to thinne perill, and men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car on il ny arien a gaigner que des coups, colomiers: il n'y a pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Sooth-sayers, hee would haue satisfied himselfe by the out-fides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrals of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second battell (which is indeed no where wel described, neither for the confusion & hastie running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, & by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that three score thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred & foure score of all sorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleue, that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauail and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate, and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers; they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honour bene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Gracian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Religon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of diuers Nations, richly armed, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would deuoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great aduantage, would make so little account of his disciplined Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (hauing so great abundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him ouerlate, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had bene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Gracian should be presently slaine: who while hee was a finding; in the Tormentors hand, vsed this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had given this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deserved punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduice.

It was the saying of a Wife man: Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita formate sunt, ut aspera que vitia, nec quicquam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, whose eares iudge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasant.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, & essentia, qua erepta consilium euascescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice given him by the Gracian Souldiers that serued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they bene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men bene able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order, in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: wee read in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits haue bene made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they haue serued, hath bene broken.

At the battaile of Rauenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not entire by their escape, he was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminenti malis opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggredimur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischiefe hanging ouer their heads may bring: and as truly of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sunt & proualentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and so spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

The Gracians also that made the retract, aduised Darius to retire his Army into the plaines of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, hee might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counsellled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby hee might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once than might haue bene well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Gracians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wife dome of God doth not work alwaies by

by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouvernours, so as they can neither giue nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a streightned piece of ground, nere vnto the Citie of Iffus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was vnto ouerthrowne; his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he embraced the Wife of the valiant Astemon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Iffus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phnicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouvernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Sitra was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battaile, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Ephesion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall blood, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompany, and could not gouerne his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornfull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leafe; the one a resolute well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius and sent him word that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander coming nere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was defended. But the Tyrans like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolute to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Land whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Libanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betweene the Land and the Maine, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrans fired, and sometime torne asunder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and pretailed, after he had spent seauen moneths in that attempt. The Tyrans in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and returned for slauess (saith Diadore) thirtene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zilouians, that serued Alexander, conueied great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrans hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betweene the Land and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Phileas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephesus had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and dedes graciously with the Jewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laierh the losse of the last battaile to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatening to encompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betweene the Riuer of Alis, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own vertue had posselt him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any, & that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdaind to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Riuers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Betu a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone: He found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the lands of Gaza, that he was foor to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entered Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Isabonensis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assilians he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawne about the street, whilst he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Heitor. It is true, that cruelly hath alwayes somewhat to cover her deformity.

Lib. 11. c. 10.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworne to Darius, had refused him. The Jewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and sanctuaries to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie covered with his Pontifical Robes; to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusall, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Permenio reprehended him for it; Howsoeuer it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophesie of Daniel had beene read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dia a Citie of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so apperrelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Jewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enioy their owne Religion.

§. VII.

Alexander winnes Egypt: and makes a iournee to the Temple of Hammon.

Rom Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Ataces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valiantest man he had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the gouernment of all Egypt. When hee had set things in order in Egypt, he began to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon, so foolish had superstition made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a marvellous showre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreame despaire. All men that know Egypt, and haue written thereof, affirm, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That hee was led by two Dragons, both which reports may bee a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the Storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay hovering directly ouer his Head at the battell of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Evropus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrans, made their defensue engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turke of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies haue many such pretie-tales; telling how they haue beene assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves doe hardly beleue. The strangest thing that I haue read of in this kinde being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nowara, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawn'g vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Triuulza and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for hee bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, betwene whom and the Territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebaïs, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the Riuer of Nilus, are interiacont; and on the North hee ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassamon, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith he) vpon the spoyles of shipwracke: whereas the Temple or grove of this Idol hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South-part of Lybia; these Nassamon being due West from it, in the part of Asiatick South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neere the place, hee sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be giuen in all things, agreeable to his madde ambition, who affected the title of Iupiters sonne. And so he was satisfied, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas hee meant to say Opaidion, he said Opai dor; that is, O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deare sonne: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was employed against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus and Bustris; and seeing these men had derided themselves from the gods, why might not hee? By this it seems, that hee hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeed hee made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and priuies; and the better to continue his followers in the beleefe of his Deitie, he had practised the Priests to giue answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should bee pleasing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams-head; I see that many wise men haue troubled themselves to finde out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who liued, saith S. Augustine, in Mosartime) Es que de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscribere, non sunt nimium curiosi perue-siganda; Wee must not ouer-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients haue writteth of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to bee preached in the world, the Deuill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Caesar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noon as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but giue credit, because I haue heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

Rom the Temple of Hammon hee returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammon, who, belike vnderstanding that he affected the Title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-king of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children saue good men.

Aaaa

He

He gaue the charge of the feuerall Provinces of Egypt to feuerall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Romane Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And hauing now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phoenicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victory would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence hee marched towards Tyris, a River for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Heere, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius easily haue repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waighy stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottome, were so round and well polished by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing: nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, otherwise then by ioyning their hands and counterlacing their armes together, making one waighy and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable help, the Channell was so deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should haue made head, as the footmen were inforced to lift their Bowes and Arrowes, and Darts ouer their heads to keepe them from being moisted, and made vnicurable by the Waters. But it was truly and verily deridingly said of Homer,

*Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotide ducit pater virorum, Deorum.*

The mindes of men are euer so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World, by the surfeit of misgovernment haue bene subiect to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feuer, and there by become franticke and without vnderstanding, for shewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Easterne shores of Tyris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durst haue charged them on euery ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, hee forsooke the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily haue overcome. But it is commonly scene, that fearefull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies and counsells, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all provisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serue themselves ouer Tyris, thinking thereby greatly to haue distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when vncounselable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competence of the Army which hee conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This, Mazeus might haue done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not haue pursued them, leauing the strength of their foote out of sight, and far behinde.

Darius, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Armenians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather seru'd to make vp the names of men, than to make resistance. Armenians haue numbered numbered them with their Leaders; and findes of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and neere fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing hee had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all sorts some three or foure hundred thousand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria, to haue ouer-borne the few numbers of the invading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre:

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitum sient praesare regem.
In victoriam; In every battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Armie after the passage ouer Tyris; there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine presage of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they should all perish; For he not onely inforced them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might bee assured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine presage of good successe; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserued the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had bene no small foole in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious obseruation Cesar made good vse, when he fought against Antionus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainly lose the battaile, Cesar forst them to abide it, though they durst not giue it; wherein hauing their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole armie in effect perished.

These Egyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Gracians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians, of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the estate of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obscured. This iudgement of the Egyptian Priests being noyed through all the Armie, all were fatished, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obserued then: Exercitum serrare plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Capitaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is possessed with master of terror.

It is truly obserued by Curtius, that the people are ledde by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, wee finde it in all stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land haue bene carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Gracians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had bene offered her; but being satisfied by an Emmon of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre on so iust and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last trial by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and resigne all Asia the lesse, and with Egypt all those Kingdoms between the Phenician Sea, & the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranfome of his Mother, and his other Daughters 30 thousand thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his son Oechus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had, Alexander causing the Embassadors to be remoued, aduised with his Councell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune, who perswaded him to accept of the se faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellepont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of faire better vse then their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander reiected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, hee might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age, to haue enioyed his estate, which afterward, indeede, hee much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselves of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeeres after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreame cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath obserued, the taint of one vniust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoeuer hee had bestowed on the Wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master, but thanks to an enemy was improper; that he made no warres against aduersitie, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise & faithfull) resolute in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territorie offered him, it was already his owne, and if Darius could beat him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleue that hee offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether hee were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, and not to receiue; That the Heauens could not hold two Summes; and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superior, hee might perchance be perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not bee so strongly fought as reports hath made it.

In this answer the Embassadors returne, Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazanes to defend a passage, which hee neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terror in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victorie, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsell given by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessarij cum multitudine pugnam cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore bella fortissimè sentire. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, hee staggers and trenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surpris had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Mitibus validius resistunt, si cibo potusque refecti fuerint, nam famem intus non magis magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight, if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were fortie thousand foot, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had besides both Syrians, Indians, Aegyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vied but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that hee needed little Rhetoric; for by the two former battailes vpon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animusque victoribus auget, et aduersarij auferit; One victorie begets another, and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit away from those that haue beene beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Reare-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly; That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But, in conclusion, Curtius deli-uers vs in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies worke, saying, That Ephesion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius), thirty thousand according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if wee beleue Diodore. But what can we iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, every man had cast but a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the banks of Euphrates, & had armed but fiftie or threecore thousand of this great multitude, one lie with Spades (for the most of all hee had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to haue past that River so easily, much lesse the River of Tygris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, hee abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowells of his kingdome, as all hope and possibilitie of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constraîne his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following; the battaile of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Armie recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoyle and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeyed than approued.

Alexander soone after Darius his departure arriues at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neer the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had beene victorious, hee might haue brought it after him at leisure; but being ouer-come, he knew it vnpossible to driue Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the overthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head, to runne away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praeterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; it is easier to reprobend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had most confidence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Capitaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, streved the streets with flowres, burnt frankincense vpon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and deliuered vnto him whatsoeuer was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Capitaine in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When he entred the Castle, he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fiftie thousand talents of silver vncoynd. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Wall, the Towers, the Gates and Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of foure score foote high, and on the top thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke priuately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Army foure and thirty daies, consuming that time in banqueting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softened the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the seuer discipline of warre which taught them the necessities of hunger and thirst, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to bee forgotten, than neglected.

An. b. Alex.

Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Capitaines which were found by certaine selected Iudges to haue deserued best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foot-bands in this latter age hath bene the cause (saith the Marshal Monluc) that the title and charge of a Capitaine hath been bestowed on euery Picque Ban or Spurr-Cow, for when the Capitaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers vnder one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the Kings were lesse charged, and sure better serued. K. Henry the eight of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Egypt, for Antipater sent him sixe thousand foote and five hundred horse, out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece foure thousand and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly bee brought againe, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

Hee left the Castle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his owne Capitaines, to wit, Aetabon, Mintius, and Alpolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the Citie vnto him, hee gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagistines that gaue vp the Castle, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence hee went on towards Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomee, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Euleus, a Citie sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, gouernour of this famous Citie, gaue it vp to the Conqueror, with fifty thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperity, not of his person, for so all ambitious men are, purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And heerein was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles hee gaue to the Persians, yet hee left all places of importance in trust with his owne Capitaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned vnto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings, are neuer to be vied alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeme their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Naniarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fomercabe, in the yere 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might haue furnished the King from Babylon; and while he stayed foure and thirty daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Susa: and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might haue relieved him, for the great masse of treasure was laied vp in that Citie. But who hath sought out and considered fearefull aduersitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune onely consult the conseruation of their owne greatnesse.

The gouernment of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giuing them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for hee left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius Mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said, that Charles the fift hauing promised Charles of Bourbon the gouernement of Marfilles, if he could haue forst it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise; because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reuolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

§. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those mountains which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Steights, called Pyle Persica, or Susiana, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forst to liue himselfe by retreat, causing his foote to march close together, and to couer themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrey, discovered vnto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforst to fight vpon euery ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receiue him) he returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yere 1515, finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vnder-taking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanhip had not saved them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had bene ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Foure thousand Greekes, saith Curtius (Iustine numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing bene taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue bene knowne to their Countrey-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receiue him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyle the Kings treasure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arriall, and they that staid followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoyle and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bene layed in the ballance with Persepolis, would haue weighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoyle that had bene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and silver, and other Jewells; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twenty thousand talents. Hee left the same number of three thousand

Macedonians

Macedonians in Perspolus, which he had done in Susa, and gaue the same formall honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Armie hee left here for thirtie dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troopes of chosen foote, hee would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare. He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, and with extreame difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsooke his horse, & led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can endure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little iudgement I shall rather commend that Capitaine, that makes carefull prouision for those that follow him, and that seekes wisely to prevent extreame necessity, than those wilde arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hauing endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Cæsar, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Perspolus, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemencie towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowling cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was enflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most lumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Perspolus, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, & thereby alienate their hearts: For they might well beleue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Verumolentiam crudelit as sequitur; Crueltie doth commonly follow drunkenness: For so it fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

ABOUT this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which he meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vied silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two onely, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabuzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Nabuzanes vied, and

and in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with did not prest towards Nabuzanes to haue slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, withheld him. In the meane while Nabuzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be quitted, and serue the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yielded vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which had in all the former Battailes serued Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retreat in spite of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destinie to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell, but he inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Capitaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things, by which the losers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to provide for himselfe. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs, for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base Cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had bene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man follows. It had bene farre more Man-like and King-like, to haue dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien beuailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a Slave by those ambitious Monsters that layd hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefites bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which about all things should haue moued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeede to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, couered with Hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and to adde despiight and derision to his aduersitie, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold, and so drew him among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Nabuzanes perswaded themselves to redeeme their liues and the Prouinces they held, either by deliuering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villany, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his Force-men beyond their powers, he mounted on horse backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with fixe thousand other Horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus tooke, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-gard being discovered by Bessus his Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to free himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, & slew two poore Seruants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leauing the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian sword.

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuite of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to moue, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood: And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which he had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he be sought him to pursue, not because Darius had de- fired it, but for his owne honour, and for the safetie of all that did, or should after wear Crownes. He also, hauing nothing else to present, rendered thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace vsed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauels were neere an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments he therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, he won their consents to goe on: which done, leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foote, and Amynas with fixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the River of Zioberus, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder-ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth againe and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fiftene dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approued and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius. He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedamonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. He was also wrought, (though to his great dishonour) to receiue Nabarzanes that had ioyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, thus such Amazons haue bene, and are.

Here it is said, that Thalestris or Mimoshea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her suite was, (which she easily obtained) That she might accompanie him till she were made with childe by him: which done (retusing to follow him into India) she returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may iustly breede suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lyfimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laugh't at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lyfimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought to single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the River of Indus, saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we beleeue and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter vnderdetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not onely Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Julius Solinus seates them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuer Thermodon, the other, neere the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. Lib. 1. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est, (saith Pandanus, who hath Commented vpon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse. It is certaine that the Cimmerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomie sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Sokranus and Pliny tels vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandæans, or Padeans, so called after Pandæa the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest deriue themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Medis leuiusq; Sabais
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarumq; sub armis, Barbarie pars magna iacet.

Claud. de cap. Proserpina.

ouer the Medes, and light Sabæans, raignes
This female sexe: and vnder armes of Queene, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath hard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea, neere Heraclum. Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tels vs that the Scythians call Aorapas, which is as much as Viricides, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon & Auentinus report, which they performed fortie yeeres after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe we read of Penelopeia, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Aeneid. l. 3.

Am. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Thermodon, speaking confidently of the Waies they made with diuers Nations, and of their overthrow.

L. 22 c. 7.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queene of the Amazons by Hercules; and by him giuen to Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference, all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gels and Lelages once a yeere, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Albanians.

But

part. 1. c. 28.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the Riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeere 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Ylricus Schmidel, that in the yeere 1542. when he sailed vpon the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrey, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ennido Rieffere, a Crowne of filuer, which he had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons, in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breasts, and liue a part from men, saue at one time of the yeere, when they feast and accompany them for one month. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Momotapain in Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line : and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the Riuer of Papamen, (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons, that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnp probable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxurie : and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Perspolis : so at this time his prosperity had so much ouer-wrought his vertues, as he accounted clemency to be but baseness, & the temperance which he had vsed all his life time, but a poore and dejected humour, rather becoming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the world could not equally. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground, & adore him; he waued the Robes and garments of the Persians, & commanded that his Nobility should doe the like; he entertained in his Court and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curlians and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, & imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, & detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he serued (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous fouer it were, could not be but fearful vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearful Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and neerest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entreating each other with this, and the like scornfull discourses; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many trauailes, more impouertised in their vertues, than enriched by their victories, and that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaues. Neither were these opinions so referred, but that the noise of them came to his eares. Hee therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgements he was most ialous, and making it knowne to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue prouoked most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their blood; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happy temeritie overcome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernment ouer the Arrians, was reuolted; whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebelle, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a strong winde, won the passage ouer an high and vnaccessable Rocke, which was defended against him, with thirtene thousand foote. For the extremities of the Flame and smoake, forced them from the place, other wise invincible. I saw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundles of straw, let downe by an yron chain, and a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendered themselves with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arrivall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horles, by the Countrey-people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir Iohn Barrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the grasse fired behinde him, but the smoake being timely discovered, he recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grasse and fedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy, than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hue.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

A*lexander* was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the reuolt of Satibarzanes, but in the end he receiued the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foote, and neere five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His iourne out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to finde Bessus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, & takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountain Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas as the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loued, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, he made shew as if he had beene won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were, that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank; whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprize) reckoned vpon Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betwixt them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to doe,

but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to address himselfe to another, one Asterion, Keeper of the Kings Armourie, who forth-with brought him to Alexander's presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betwene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to haue bene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimmus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherem haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimmus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might iustly breede. His answer was, That when the practice was reuealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he iudging it to be but friuolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, & made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this busines; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could neuer finde a better occasion to oppress his priuate enemy, than by pretending pittie, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And arm'd with power and Princes ialousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessories vnto ends vnjust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfullst vndertaking with distrust;
So that base villeniesse, idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King, following the aduice of Craterus, had relolued the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him, he cryed out vpon the King in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were virg against him by Alexander himselfe, (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the Kings honour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon: He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the Gods, and yet he could not but withall grieve for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despiight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe, where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers, Hecitor and Nicanor hauing bene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly oppress with griefe, as for a while he could vtter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sank vnder those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence, he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him, which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderstand him. But hereof the King made his aduantage, perswading the assembly, that he dilained the language of his owne Countrie, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inueyed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For not his enemies only were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, hauing discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contending among themselves, which of them should exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other arguments, which he vied in his owne defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimmus, what men of murke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnto him, that men of murke and power were his partners in the conspiracie) Dimmus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amynias, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly haue valued the party, and haue encouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimmus, thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though he had neuer dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intentes that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inuol'd by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that aduerty being feldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not alwayes deserring it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoeuer it were, to auoide the extremity of resistlesse and vnnatural torments, deuised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cennus, Ephestion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would haue slaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope; and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and bloud, he was forced to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatsoeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Of this kinde of iudicial proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur? cum queritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas penas: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur: what shall we say tei, when one is put to torture in his owne case; and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie, not because he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it:

Aug. de Ciuit.
Dei, l. 1. c. 6.

It had bene enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had bene put to death without torment, the rest would not much haue grieved therat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolans, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motiue of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, in dignum apud animo; serina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus. & abiecto homine, in siluestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is rauish of so wilde a spirit. It is euen a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

Seneca C. 1. 1.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made, were to giue end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truly, or they that deny falsly, cometo one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lyncestes, Sonne-in-Law, to Antipater, who had bene three yeeres in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused; others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by louing those whom the King fauoured; they were dismissed. But Parmenio was yet liuing; Parmenio, who had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe, Parmenio the first opened the way into Asia; That had deprest Arabus the Kings enemy; that had lawes, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlkely that he would haue dishonoured his fidelitie in his eldest age, hauing now liued threcore and ten yeeres) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had posselt themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatcht. Polydamos was employed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militis domig, clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magnæ rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthy of praise.

Lib. 7.

§. XV III.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

After these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Araspiani or Euergetani; he made Amendes (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouvernour, then he subdued the Arachosiani, and left Menon to command ouer them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length he came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age and with traualles of the warre. The Arians, who since he left them were reuolted, he subdued againe by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigius; And now he resolues to finde out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouvernour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, in so much as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. He found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was foor to sew together the Hides that covered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie, which Bessus might easily haue distrest, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Armie afarre off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had styled himselfe King, he durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therefore those that were neere vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Calanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his necke like a massiffe Cog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with Greeks of Mileum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whose issues had well nere forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly after they had receiued him with great ioy he put to the sword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxartes, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assailed his Campe; in repelling whom he receiued a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lyter, sometime by the horse-men, sometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Peroninus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compass threecore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Amians) who offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Calanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Citie were resolutely defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these he receiued a blow on the necke, which stricke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais, vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria threecore furlongs in compass, which he beautified with houses within seuentene daies after the wals built. The building of this Citie is said to haue bene occasion of a war betwene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for very feare, should neuerthelesse make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northernne deserts, but only the defence of his owne bank) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further then they should agree to suffer him. Yet hercof is made a great matter, & a victory described, in pursuist of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Taxartes, that runs betwene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart and vnkowne. So that Alexander had (besides Taxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to swim ouer, ere he could recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he liued in Asia in that traualle.

Wherefore it is enough to beleue, that the Asiatique Scythians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue some hindrance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Armes, easily chased some ten or twelue miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iourne, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Countre, where he could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set vp a monument.

Threecore of the Macedons are said to haue bene slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be in passing a great Riuer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perished in battell: yet Caesar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath bene so inquisitiue into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers haue bene able to deliuer such particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to set downe what wee finde; especially when it serues to giue light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost, the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not vsuall in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnes of Alexander) & the little bootie that was gotten, doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the reputation of a few routing Tartars (the like being yeerly performed by the Mosconie, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others:

While Alexander was assuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Taxarus, he receiued the ill newes that Menemius was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appeale the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and laies waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Gouernour in that Province.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lyca, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, he returnes towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof he built fixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-up-Rebell, called Arimas, (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred yong men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to periwade Arimas to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Maccedon was already mounted vp, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death, which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue bene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Island of Sarke, ioyning to Garnsey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maria time surprisid by the French, and could neuer haue bene recouered againe by strong hand, hauing cartell and corne enough vpon the place to feede so many men as will seeue to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carcasse, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French receiued them at their landing, and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rocks with great difficulty; some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased; but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set vpon the French; they run to the Cliffe and cry to their Company aboard the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions-skin, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How Alexander slew his owne friends.

After these Sogdian and Scythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other friuolous matters, and that he committed the Gouernment of Maccedonia, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he obiected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammus:

for therein hee toucheth him to the quick; the same being deliuered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deferred as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular saved his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neyther of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the griefe wherof hee ture his owne face and sorrowed so immediately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance; but preceding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailings. Omine vitium ebrietas & incendit, & deiecit; obstantem malis comatibus veretur diuina remouet; ubi possidet animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali laedit, emergit: non facit ebrietas villa sed prolatio. Drunkenness both kindles and layes open euery vice; it remooues out of the way that shame which giues impediment vnto badde attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkenness indeed rather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized vpon his fellow conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these petty Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which hee past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Temeple a thousand of his Trainee. From hence he inuaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Countie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes, who submitted himselfe vnto him, feared him greatly, & presented him with thirte beaurifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Maccedonians disclained, yet none of them durst vlc any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, hauing lo increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Maccedonians, hee employed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleus; whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments, vied to the assembly, he told Cleus, That hee thought, that Alexander would disclaime the gift of God head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet living in the world. Hee further told him; That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleus at a carousing feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbered among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to reuenge on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a loue of the Kings honour, was yet loone after tormented to death; not for that hee had betrayed the King to others: but because he neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolus and others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a-sunder vpon the racke: This deed, unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas ex redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Perfarum multa milia: opponitur, & Calisthenem: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit Durium: opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quotiens dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenuis viciit, ipsum quoque tentans nouis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciae usque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicitur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transferit, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magni meritis quam scilicet Calisthenes; This is the eternal crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicitie of his in Warre shall euer be able to redeme. For as often as any man shall say, Hee slew many thousand Persians: it shall be replied, Hee did so, and hee slew Calisthenes: When it shall be said, Hee slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes; When it shall be said, Hee wanne all as farre as the very Ocean; shewen also hee aduentured with vnusall Rames; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient, it shall be said withall; But hee killed Calisthenes. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples examples of Captaines and Kings, none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as Callisthenes to his reproach.

§. XX.

of Alexanders journey into India. The battails betwene him and Porus.

In the Armie before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot, and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as he submitted themselves vnto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest hee constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Childe, where they resisted. He then came before Nisibis, built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence hee removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victuals failing, hee diuides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Canon another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Masage, which had in it 3. hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded vnto him by Cleopha the Queene, to whom againe hee restored it; at the siege of this Citie hee received a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polysperchen, and a Rocke of great strength by himselfe: hee wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as hee arrived at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus, hee found there Ephesition, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and five and fiftie Elephants, vnto him, offering him his seruice and assistance. He made Alexander know, that hee was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this disunion to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, to doo hee the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourscore talents of silver coyne; which Alexander not onely refused, but to shew that hee was covetous of glory, not of gold, hee gave Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne strength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betwene them, than that which the chance of Warre gave, hee thought it an ill march when Alexander, who had already beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom hee sent a commandement, that hee should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee received this manly answer; That hee would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe over the Riuer Hydaspes, and to finde Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer ere he had scene India. The Riuer was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deep and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacitee. Alexander sent Ptolomie vp the Riuer with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedonia meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander towards the farther shore without resistance. Hee orders his troopes and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeueth, that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come over Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it. But

But he findes it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hippias with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Both waggons had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse, for there had fallen forth much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly troe it. The Sythians and Dahians had the Vanguard, who so called these Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdicas also gaue vp the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were foor to recoile. Porus mooues forward with greife of his Armie, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recouer his Reabe: Alexander being followed with Ephesition, Ptolomie, and Perdicas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horsemen on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Canon to invade the right, Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended, but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long & strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who did so farre exceede Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countie peoples. Yet for his owne person hee neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe hee recleued his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a fruitles discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their traualles: or of those pettie Warres which Alexander made betwene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his falling downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to beleue; till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be scene betwene London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandenile, who died in the yeere 1372. and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accompt the greatest fabler of the World, yet had hee another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. With this Monument made of him in the Count of the Friars Guillimins in Liege, where there is a Mausoleus of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence. For an honourable memorie of his Excellence, saith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradrin, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possesed by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlaine, who commands all that tract betwene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascensibay a shippe of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and some of the company travelled ouer Land till they came to Agra; the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagrag, being named of old Dumy Apolius.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyanicus, speaking of the expedition of Bucchius and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (which Alexander sought by all means to ouercome) when they were indured to submit to them the Oxydracks, a people inhabiting betwene the Riuer of Hyphar and Ganges, they were taken from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightning. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainly knowne, that the great Kings of the vnters of East India had the vse of the Cannon many hundred of yeeres since, and euen since their first ciuill and great wars, which was long before Alexanders

Gate in Disf. of the Low Countries,

Alexander's times. But Alexander pierced not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that hauing the adieue ouer-weared his Armie, hee discouered the rest of India by lame. The Indian Kings, whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfulllest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yett all the art hee had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great Deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yett at the last contented they were, after many periswaine Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettie trick, wherewith hee hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. Hee enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. Hee caused all furniture of Men and Horses to be made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered the Armour and Britles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Sauiages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his Iournies end. This was a readie way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing (saue a supposition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing hee thought so carnellie to make it thought more than it was).

This done, he returned againe to the bankes of Acefines, and there determined to set vp his fleet where Acefines and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nica, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fixe and twenty thousand Armour, garnished with siluer and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuer he wagne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assailing a Cite of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Esau of Sheshampton, fituolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and when of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. Hee feasted these Embassadors vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be deuised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggon, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

These great triumphs ended, hee sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these hee builded another Alexandria. Of many places which hee tooke in this passage, Arrianus says, one of the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomee (afterward King of Aegypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander brought he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent. When he came neerer the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a sudden thrust one vpon another by the Flood, so on the Ebbe they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandie bankes of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, hee past out of the riuers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned; and the better to informe himselfe, hee sent Nearchus and Oncetricus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his first Booke hath written this passage downe the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Voyles, in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were vied therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

After the arrivall of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eightene daies march downe the River, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie miserie for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

§. XXII.

Of Alexanders Riot, Crueltie, and death.

IN Rom Gedrosia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Perfia, hee gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hateful enough in it selfe, yett it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the fest, for Aspastes one of his Provinciaill Governors he commanded to bee slaine, so as neither did the excesss of voluptuousnesse qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While hee visited his Army in these parts, a new supply of fixe thousand foote and a thousand horse was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the killing of Parmanio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether desired of his reuenge out of India, they durst not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them employed, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one reioicing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Oncetricus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an land rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discovery: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orfines, one of the Princes of Perfia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in especiall fauour with the King, was neglected, he not onely practised certaine loose fellows to witness against Orfines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which hee was condemned to die; but hee assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Casperat (saith Curtius) esse preceptis ad reprehensanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; Nec began head-longly to shed blood, and to beleeue false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his gouernement, seeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all aduentures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had liued threecore and thirtene yeeres. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrey, being an Indian, Or sought to preuent the griefe and incommodie of elder age, it is vncertaine; but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada hee came to Susa, where he married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her younger sister to his beloued Ephesion, and fourecore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thousand yong souldiers, out of his conquered Prouinces, wherewith the Macedonians greatly murmured, Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, hauing lawfully consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fixe thousand Talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers, but hee was rejected in Greece, and there slaine. Alexander greatly reioiced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yett hee sent commandement, that they should againe receiue their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselues (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. Hee vied many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twinethred, when they have tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily condu-ced when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenanthip of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greekes in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly if A- lexander had not taken counsell of his cups, hee would haue cast some better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remooue, than to haue im-ployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though iaculous, doe not stand in doubt of every man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fear-full vnto them, as they take leaue both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After hee had sent for Antipater, hee made a journey into Media to settle things there, where Ephestion, whom hee fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse, hangs his Physicion, and bestowes vpon his Ma-nument twelue thousand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent, and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if wee beleue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaue- say) Antipater by his sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Tolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poyson; Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) hauing inuited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after hee had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, hee que-ted the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World haue seldome found good, by making their Ministers ouer great, and thereby suspicious to themselves. For hee that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The onely restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be obserued. It may bee that Antipater hauing commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelue yeeres, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Caesar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gauls, where he utterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruell and vngratefull traitor Anti- pater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callithenes, hauing bene so lately acted) yet hee knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to haue gi-uen him some other great gouernment in Asia: The old Souldiers the next returned, hauing perchaunce desired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII. Of Alexanders person and qualities.

Howsoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanitie to be cecemed the sonne of Iupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkenesse, which others make the cause of his feuer and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Caesar found iust cause to decide him, as if the well-gouerning of so many Nations and Kingdomes, as he had already conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his braines withall.
That hee was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot bee doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the Aduancement of Learning, hath prooued it sufficiently.
His liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to giue: of which Seneca, animos

animos non videtur ex regia, cum sit stultissima. Rebus enim per se quemquam decet. Refert, quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabat; habetur personatum et dignitatum proportio, et cum sit ubi, virtutis modus, aque peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit: It seems a brave and royall speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe becomes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as faultie as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that he had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely if aduenturous nature were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theutes, Ruffians, and multitude of Dogges. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which wee are employed for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the World, who haue bought their glory with so great destruction, and effusion of blood, I thinke him farre inferiour to Caesar, and many other that liued after him, seeing hee neuer vnderooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was euer encountered with any Armie of which he had not a most mastering aduantage, both of weapons & Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captaines by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their neckes to the yoke, and Kingdomes, that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father; and Alexander the Sonne, giues this iudgement of them: Quod non minores fuere pestes mortalium quam inun- datio, quaplanum domine perfusum est, quam conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exaruit;
They were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an overflow of Waters, drowning all the land; or some burning abroad, whereby a great part of liuing creatures are scorched vp.

CHAP. III.

The reigne of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Poly- phemus, having lost his onely eye. For, that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Mace- donians: their force was incollerable, but for want of good guidance vneffectuall, and harmefull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof vnder the diuine ordinance were, partly the vn-certainty of Title to succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stubborne pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthy to bee his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving euery one to his owne fortune:
but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly bene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdom, not rendering it vnto Amynas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when hee grew to mans estate, but only bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much mote by his owne proper strength, hee assured the Crowne vnto himselfe:
Amynas neuer attempting ought against Philip, though with price of his life: he did Cccc against

against Alexander in the beginning of his reigne. Wherefore Eurydice the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to haue bene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbade the reigne of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had vterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deferring to bee laid in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall feat.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had issue by none of the principall of them. But the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom hee had more solemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the basenesse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, & Aridaus his base brother (sonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in courſe. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may giue suspition, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe vncapable of the Soueraignty: Aridaus (besides his bastardie) was neither for person nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counsaillers hauing ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in deuising what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomie (soone after King of Egypt) concurring with them who reiected all mention of the halfe-Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should bee giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should bee decreed: so farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomie was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vsed the company of Arſinoe Ptolomies mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with childe. Therefore, whether it were so, that hee hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeme their quiet with subiection to one, deferring regard by his blood, and trust for his euen carriage; or whether he desired onely to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe, had all bene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridaus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such counsaile as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deuice of his tooke place indeed, though not in forme: as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders empty chaire, as Ptolomie had conceiued the forme of their consultations, or to sit in the chaire such a King as Aridaus, no wiser then the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfaint shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take checke by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to worke: so was it like to haue fared with Ptolomie & the rest, when Arſinoe, another of the Captaines, interpreted the very words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he deliuered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should bee disposer of his owne purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another consideration: euey one being vncertaine how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not bee of the latest, vsed Perdiccas to take vpon him the estate Royall. Hee was no stranger to the Royall blood; yee his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that especially since the death of Ephesius (a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might wel be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his private valour. But very surly he was: which quality (ioyned with good fortune) carried a shew of

Maiestie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name: Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Arſinoe, he would needs counterpoise that modestie thinking that euey one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse enuious, the more solemnity he vsed in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that saith himselfe a sheepe, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Meleager, (a man by nature enuious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) tooke aduantage of his irresolute behauiour, and very bitterly enuighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore hee invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridaus, with the troubles there about arising;
the first diuision of the Empire.

Vving this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Arme. Meleager hauing withdrawn himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad to finde an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridaus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles wightsood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolve what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, tooke vpon him to proclaim the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yett horne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with sixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new king about whether he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and inforced them to accept Aridaus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horſe, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion, that should happen among the infantry. The king (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honeste then they came; bringing sorry for their bad enterprife. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in a vp-rore, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said; that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprife, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the furest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renewed out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing betwene the

the King, and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Autors of sedition giuen vp into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be ioyned with Leontas and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernment of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider, that such men as had once day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. General peace was renewed, and much loue proceetd where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had bene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life; and windy spirits they were which mooued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injury done to himselfe; and (as delirious of true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a loue of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischieuouly laied: Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of dissension, &cherby with a publike approbation might haue been cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weake a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitie set in aray, apart from others, as if they had bene of sundrie forts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horsemen: of which custome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the veter confusion of his enemies. For Aridamus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe at the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as staid followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they lent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, diuided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leauing to Aridamus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Prosector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought vpon; whose body hauing been seven daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great foeuer the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridamus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeeres preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid, many coarces of his friends being layed in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his owne building, in Egypt.

§. III.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

Hilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferior to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more brauely than wisely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more holily than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Græcian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in euery City he would haue a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wanted by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leophanes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leaue an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leophanes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the Citty of Athens declared it selfe, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the libertie of Greece. Hercules Leophanes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue barraile to the Boeotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (wringing in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their desires a farre off, which deceiue all mortall wisdome, euen when they seeme neere at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon, which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likly assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence,) and to succeed Antipater in the gouernment of Macedon and Greece. The suspitions were strong that he had a priuy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to be leauied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne ialousie and hatred of him; but yet he stroueto smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted euen lewd gouernment) in bafe persons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Viceroy tenne yeeres in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuy of a Court, wherein they had bene his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to prevention, working first the kings death by poison, giuen by his sonne Iolans, Alexander cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruell performed by his sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeeres.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of companies lying neere, solicited solicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse; which Multier was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeede who had long stood firme for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great seruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessalietie the fortune of a battaile with Leosthenes; rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checked at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Asolians, and Mercinaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had reuolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retraite into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to beare out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon rescall closevp the Towne with earth-works, and a wall. There will we leaue him for a while, trauailing in the last honourable enterprife that euer was vndertaken by that great Citie of Athen.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Aridaus liuing vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vse of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his gouernement. A stronger Armie then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vntested condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue beene. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely fought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicas the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Aioffas sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeede) beene oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatall Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slaine) with sufficient honour, might he haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians roome. This he did not, neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater businesse wherein to entertaine his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of sure retrait, vnder the government of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not incountred a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vse the victorie: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and so deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Pythom rather as to the most honorable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythom was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon weary of their vnpleasant habitations, & the rude people people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seek to make themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythom went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enioyned it vnto Pythom Captaines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for vse of the victory might haue proued needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Pythom: did in the heate of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a hill not farre off. This dimaid the rest, and gaue the day to Pythom: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie, vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnes whereof Pythom might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherient in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythom, leauied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in peeces all those poore men who had yielded themselves; leauing Pythom as naked as he came forth to retaine vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty about the mighty, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

§. V.

The proceffe of the Lamian warre.

Next Antipater hardly besieged, wanting meanes to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soone as he expected, hee came to parley with Leosthenes, and would haue yielded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie, doe seldom limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring warre, the Aetolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or hauing businesse which they pretended at home) tooke their leaue, and returned into their owne Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to fall out vpon his enemies to the great losse: for many were slaine, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulled into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieued, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight, Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus, who was necrest at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading more than foure thousand foote, and two thousand horse, against Seuthus the Thracian King, who brought into the field about foure times that number; and though Lysimachus not without losse, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leosthenes was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, whether leauied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing ling to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come. For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bene requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion, that soone ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach, forsooke the siege of Lamia, and tooke the ready way to the great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Asiatics) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he won a great victorie (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marshy piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his natiuitie. He was the first of Alexanders Capitaines which died in battaile, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing furable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betooke themselves to high grounds, vsuit for seruice on horse backe, and abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their campe, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage; which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This retchlesse inecorrigible in an Army of voluntaries was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, wherethe Athenians labouring to haue made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captiuitie of Greece came on, of which she neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Army hauing made great marches from Greece, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessalie, ioynd himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioynd in one, contained fiftie thousand waighfully armed, three thousand light armed men, and fife thousand horse, of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and fife hundred in horse, in foot eightheene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to auoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceiued their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall backe. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred and thirty men, they had onely purchased the death of some fife hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subiect vnto the full command of one General, and being euerie one desirous to preferre his owne estate, and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtile artificer, and well vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euerie City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was reiected; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the comming of their Assitants, whose vnreasonable carelesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VI.

§. V L.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

Hic Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inuiuing such as were slacke. Onely the Athenians and Asiatics held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing bene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the feare of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuising vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in real effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the gouernment of the City to those of most wealth, depriuing of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a conuenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen: a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of begerly persons, accustomed to get their liuings out of the common troubles, being now debaured from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent vsurpation of a few inroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quier of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue surrendered their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vterly, calling him a bloody tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honorably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswaded him to leaue the place, but not so preuailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respite as it had bene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, howsoeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loued money well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinks) intaking from the Persians which loued not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not cease to procure, when the Perfians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Country, yet applying himselfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquished) he endeoured carefully to preserve.

§. VII.

Now Craterus and Antipater were drawne from their Atolian warres into Asia.
The grounds of the first Ciuill Warre betwene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Atolians, whose pouerty was not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Country was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnesse, into which they conueied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacy did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Atolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and viterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miserable choice, either to defend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians: who incited by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremity, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Atolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies dayly molested them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke every houre a month, till they had rid their hands of these Atolians, giuing them whatsoeuer conditions they would aske: yet with purpose to call them to strict account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitie, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation inteed by Antipater & Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it serued merely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiatique expedition, which did set the world in an vpror, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedency, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next vnto these had Perdiccas been; whom the aduantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour to either of these, if not to both together. The first intentions of Perdiccas were, to haue consorted with these two, and to haue been with them a third partner in the government of all; to which purpose he entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Aridæus was a very simpleman, yet serued well enough to weare the title of that Maiestie, whereof Perdiccas being Admittorator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practice was more leuere than had beene in the dayes of Alexander: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giuing such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazell the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Asia were all put to the sword, and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already bene shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfaite Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was viterly razed, the children sold for slaues, and all the rest massacred. The Issanians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themselves vnable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the yongmen did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and siluer; but Perdiccas had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without employment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, andooke deepe roote in their severall Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seat of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the offices of his Vice-roys (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of priuate men, and onely Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatnesse meete with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or be driuen to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into; and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceiued in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a iudgement, as high a spirit, and as great vnderstanding, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene lesse than some of theirs, which made him also the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a ialous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Iudge that sought his death. This deuice Antigonus would not seeme to percieue, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answer, indeede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings, as finished the Atolian warre before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceiue their owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderstand that his intentions were laied open, and must now be iustified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not onely for defence, but (as hauing on his side the Kings name) to meete with them at home, who were nothing slacke in providing to encounter him. Ptolomie being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how neerely they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great solemnitie, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie coming against him.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolved to set vpon Ptolomie, leaving Eumenes to keepe to his vse, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quicke end with Ptolomie, or beleued that Craterus would not be ready for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behaviour allured many to his party, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined, An affection founded vpon opinion of an vnusult contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without success. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good speed; for Ptolomie preventing him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauing himselfe not onely as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another iourne (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to pass his Armie into an Island, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly fordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men ben athir; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell began to waxe deepe; so, that whyleas the former companies had waded vp to the chin, they who should haue followed could finde no footing. Whiche thus came by rising of the water, or sitting away of the ground; the earth being broken with the feete of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants; no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the Riuer, where in about two thousand of them perished, a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Cynops; many were carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrary banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the euill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomie, which did set them in a vp-rore. Ptolomie had not onely shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rites of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuer had cast vpon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely moue the common Souldiers, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like slaves. The sedition growing strong wanted onely a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement; after the victory vpon the rebellious Greekes. Pythion had liued in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Prouinces made Gouvernour of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had neuertheless beene scornfully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mis-gouerning authoritie of Perdiccas. He might haue liued as great as any, could he haue suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peraduenture master of all, had he not bene too masterly ouer those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the Campe, where he was ioyfully receiued; hee extolled himselfe of things past, as not hauing bene Author, or giuen cause of the Warre; and was easily beleued: the fauour of the Armie being such toward him, that needes they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refused. It was an Office fit for one, that would seeke to increas his greatnesse with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough already; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deferring of him he procured that honourable charge to Pythion, and to Artemus the Captaine, who hauing had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these businesse came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies sooner, had bene entertained with ioyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his priuate maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would haue giuen them wel-come, found bad acceptance, as sh ill be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

Before we proceed in the relation of things, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesse in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answer that he would not; alleging the backwardnesse of his men to beare Armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly hee repined at the Precedency giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discouraging, through the counterfained looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart wisely dissembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweete language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that he might stand vpon his owne strength, hee raised out of the Countie vnder his iurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giuing many priuiledges to such as were seruiceable, and training them well vp. Not without great need. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly repalled the Hellepont) for the inuasion of his Prouinces, hee would Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnprompted, presented him battell. Neoptolemus had secretly countenanced Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and preuailed farre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driuen out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leauing naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to be charged by Eumenes who forced them in such wise, that casting downe their Pikes, they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeouored with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betwene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which hee had undertaken to maintaine.

Whilst these negotiations were on foote, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught,) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations, assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victory was wonne; for

they would all forth-with revolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to consent to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile as much, as the force which he drew along. For hee had in the midst of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparel, whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new trickes of Asia, with discontented eyes, as reprochfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to ioyne with Ptolomy. Craterus vsed great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes recuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Capitaines, altera great victory. But he had a warie and well-advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore hee feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own in footmen, but was inferior in horse-men) & thought more vncasie to keepe the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange peece of worke, which desperation of all courtes might haue taught him, & wife managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had chosen Perges (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to ioyne with him. He animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among the, (as hauing bin vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrell) he took great care to keep them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpeter should be admitted; and not heere-with satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had he bin knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas & himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run vpon the enemy, & giue him no leisure to say or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his own person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, & ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of fruitlesse hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing faile in surprising them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends & fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phenix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindefull of their instructions, began to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight & redeem the day, and take the spoyle to themselves. But the Beare whose skin he fels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes & Neoptolemus, who as soone as they had discouered one another, could not containe themselves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose scullings he requited, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spur, and seeke shelter behinde the battailes of their foote. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie

succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phenix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or more. Otherwise it is not vnlike, that he might haue either carried the day, or preferred himselfe to a better aduantage by giuing ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilst hee fought to preferre his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued, vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foote by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was onely to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) hauing done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the newes. But other matters there were, which incited men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoyle of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the loue of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had beene Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithlesse, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithlesse; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrells betwene Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector. Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weak to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well vnderstanding what she was or should be, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune laied vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Antipatras, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman, she had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto herselfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same ynwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had sought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward beereinued with a twined thread: Python bearing himselfe vpon his office, tooke vpon him to giue directions in the Kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controul, vsing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python,

Pythion, seeing this, would needs resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, hee should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing forrie at this countie, for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Pythion, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Pythion. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband; the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand, arrived in few daies at the Campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Gouvernours of Prouinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and P.ines along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonius General of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that warre.

§. XI.

Antigonius Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatnesse of Antigonius, whose power in few yeeres ouer-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might finde occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vnderooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions, but obedient onely at discretion. Therfore Antigonius tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers, tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as he thought easiest to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking to carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when hee thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which hee thought now to bee in company with Antigonius) kept his treachery secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vnderaken, Antigonius presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, General of the Horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable mischiefe which this traitorous practice had brought vpon him, pursued the villaine, and cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troops of Antigonius, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battell, which disabled him vterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing hee did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonius himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonius held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had bene fought: there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his owne men, men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their camp) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victory, and laden with the spoyle of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which he might haue taken: but fearing least such a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, hee gaue secret warning to Menander to flee to the mountaines, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaues, and to rauish their wiues: but Antigonius told them, that he had not forborne to doe this out of any good will to them, but out of mere subtiltie: had auoyded those precious fetters, which would haue hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all carriages to bee out of burden some, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining onely five hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When hee had wearied Antigonius a while in following him vp and downe, hee came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, hee louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lyconia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeeres. Thither did Antigonius follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose hee entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonius offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Prouinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonius leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iourne into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captaine as Eumenes to haue defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had bene too late before his coming, so were they too aduenturous, in fighting at the first fight, vpon all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with futable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcetus fled to the Citie of Termessus, where the loue of the yonger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their eares against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their liues and their Countrie in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing: For the Gouvernours of the Towne hauing secretly compounded with Antigonius, caused the yong men to fall out, and vsing the time of advantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alcetus, who vnable to resist slew himselfe. His dead body was conueied to Antigonius, and by him barbarously torne, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonius was gone, the yong men interred the carcasse with solemne funeralls, hauing once bene minded to set on fire their owne towne in reuenge of his death. Such fauor had he purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able General, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Ptolomie winnes Syria and Phenicia. The death of Antipater.

Whilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Governments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Only Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phenicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Armie, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, farre from assistants, and vainly relying vpon the authority which had giuen him that Prouince, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those busineses in Asia. He had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Atolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, preuailling farre at the first, but soone losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so farre forth, that suspecting the youth of his own Sonne Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge, hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was ialous of him, and the successe of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his priuate qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosphicall behauiour, not vnlearned, as hauing beene Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had beene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne, he compelled to abstaine from coming into Macedonia, or concerning in matters of Estate: yea, at his owne death hee gaue especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approoved to haue beene found an ill good.

§. XIII.

Of Polyperchon who succeeded vnto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrections of Cassander against him.

P*olyperchon* was very skillfull in the Art of Warre, hauing longtime beene Apprentise in that occupation; other qualities, requisite to high an Office as hee vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally than wisely, as a man of a second witte, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage, he called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for waighy considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons hold them) the Queene Olympias was renoued out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should bee filled with all Maiestic, that might giue authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force haue beene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilst present mischiefe lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could hee discern such oddes in the quality of himselfe and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to implice. Hee should thereby haue beene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore he began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captaines, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpees, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene

Eurydice,

Eurydice, who had in priuate rendred him such curtesie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because he saw Polyperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them: vpon the safest counte, and most free from all suspicion. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Army, before the businesse was set on foote; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire means. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his government of Aegypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in needde of a ciuill Warre, which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betwene his Father and them, would assiste him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both, and within a little while conuicied himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellepont, that he might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polyperchon worke, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite coniuurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same come; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very deere lyued, he would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus fastened one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common means, leading to their seuerall ends.

§. XIII.

The unworthy courses held by Polyperchon, for the keeping downe of Cassander.

Great necessity there was of timely prouision. For Polyperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to worke circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authority, should forthwith be either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankfull nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bountie had enabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who fought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians? and in opposition to their priuate Enemie, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through sinne, newes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more intraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neereest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; she hath taught the arte to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are depraued affections, affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of liberty, under the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subjects, and oftentimes subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchons decree. The death of Phocius.

Notwithstanding the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of the Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Atimillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocius, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievously would they haue beene offended, had they knowne the instructions which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retaine Munychia, any intinction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should finde means to thrust some Companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauē, against the high-Towne. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocius word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of their own, which how to vse, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did all waies measure iustice by profit, yet seldom thrured by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captaine following Polyperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocius, who then gouerned in Athens, a man very vnlikely to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politike dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to deuise vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iust reuenge. He leauied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauē, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselves vnto him, who made faire shewes, intending meere mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before she durst well aduenture to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which he held; but he would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the life of Samos should be rendered vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them haue themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leaue in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His son Alexander not ignorant of this, made fire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communicating with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labor, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew ialous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they powred out vpon Phocius, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euery one that best could inueigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedy for the euill threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander deuiling how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much priuie conference with him, which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocius with many of his friends, were accused, and driuen to seeke saueguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyperchon was in the Countrey of Phocia, ready to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocius with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own desert, (hauing alwaies beene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrey gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocency. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon, was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue he gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast lockt vp: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wauering betwene the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeede haue done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wisest way to redeeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which was then growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phocius heeles, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemn audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exterior shewes of maiestie; yet all too little to change Arideus into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and flaine. This was enough to raise his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake, whole Embassadors he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearers, Phocius and the rest were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgeses. Then were they sent away to Athens, wherethey found a multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocius being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had he beene chosen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent: so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, euen of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in Warre, whose though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counsaile: nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of siluer, and offered to bestow vpon him of four Cities in Asia any one which he would chuse. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouerty: wherein he liued about foure score yeeres, and then was compelled by the vnjust iudgement of wicked men to drinke that poyson, which by iust iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

§. XVI.

NOr long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polyperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Onely he had giuen some impediment to the enemy; who not contented with defending what he held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, he left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further inroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratic, or Popular forme of gouernement. Hee commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either slain, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedom and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subiection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which hee termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fiftene thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that hee ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betwene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assaultants hauing failed to carry the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the Towns-men perceiving their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nailes, which they vied as gill-throps, bestowing them slightly, couered with the points upwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they let any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beate vpon their sides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these provisions they made happy vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen backe vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polyperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, hee forsooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour; leaving some part of his Armie to lye before the Towne for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyne with Aridamus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouerthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, assuring him of the victory, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be waited ouer the Streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good facility in penning bloody decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne sword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to giue them Protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly resorted vnto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrey set in a combustion, vncleane to be quenched; which presented vnto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treates with Eumenes, who disspointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by Antigonus.

N*Antigonus* had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himselfe the vermost benefite that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in faire season for aduancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Army remaining, saue onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time, when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the present estate was manifestly subiect, would in continuance of some yeres (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & horses might grow sickly and vnseruiceable: which made him to practise many deuices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued shut vp in this manner about a yeere, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces hee had besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that hee could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs, wherein hee doubted not that hee should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than euer hee had beene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the forme of the oath, did perceiue the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and summe of all were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonus, omitting all reueration of duty to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vncomely to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the masterie; and being assured that his voluntary assistance, which way soeuer hee gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would hee not therefore breake off for the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to giue vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nera, liked his words, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as he came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue some of the Gouvernours of the Prouinces, behauing himselfe according to the authority which he had receiued of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers, why might not he himselfe as well retain the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient whilst he liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To giue a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three score thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceiued his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridaus Gouvernour of Thracia, who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and sought to haue won zicus, a faire Haven Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countie. Aridaus was so faine from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Chim, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already bene declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authority from the Court, resisteth greatly against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much ielousie in Cassander, as feare in Polyperchon, which might haue brought them to termes of reconciliation; It would aske more time than he could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not onely refuse to take his part, but would make warre vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, made great halte toward Silicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, he had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouvernours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or silver-shielded bands, commandement was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this authority was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and to her Nephew the sonne of Alexander, and in the meantime to giue her his aduice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for she was desirous desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Ephrus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue, which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seeds of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexander's mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, sauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, borne at Cardus, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled he was to traualle as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that pursued his heeles.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridaus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

OW, forasmuch as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which ouer-threw most of them, and out of their mines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue bene depending.

Aridaus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the kingdome, and become Gouvernour to a King of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to lether husband serue as a Scale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had bene through Alexander's malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolute, both to suppress the linage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weak husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, so as they might reigne in their severall Countreies, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would haue suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Pencestes and some others with much adoe hardly made resistance, vntill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters, which he liued not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wiues. It was thought that she had given poyson to Aridaus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece: thought it the best way to ioyne with Polyperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Roxane, remouing Aridaus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent the procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polyperchon, who ioyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to let aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. She her selfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as she could, vntill she thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

The two Queens met armed, as if the matter should haue beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the reuolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to minde her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victory without bloud, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintaine her, whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridaus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for fcare left the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Aridaus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death; who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom he commanded to be slaine. His brother Isidrus that was already dead and buried, she accused of poyson giuen to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tomb to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the gouernment of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was reuenged vpon Olympias.

†. I.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her selfe into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Aecides King of Epirus, comming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he neuer staid to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrey, (though Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne; and so in all haste he tooke his journey toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire of iust reuenge. The Aetolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylae, in fauour of the Queene and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in

in dealing with them, got together as many shippes as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he diuided his companies, appointing some vnder Callus, a subtile Capitaine, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perhabia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, hauing once preailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Majestically, than to make her selfe strong. To this end she made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong son Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designement: who, during his minority kept the Soueraigne power in her owne hands. But all this pompe ferued to little vyle, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himselfe before the wals, onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all parts arriue, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Aecides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his cosen, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuerthelesse, his Subjects were nothing willing in this expedition, but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceede, and the obstinate refusall of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when he had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraigne Countreies a banished man, his people ioyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp strightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conueyed into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were manag'd abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her storie. Polyperchon defeated. Extream famine in Pydna. Olympias yeeldes to Cassander.

Now, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympias yet a while to the howre of her destiny, which grows the faster vpon her, because she may discern it comming; yet that wee may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we haue done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had beene, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callus, who was sent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with money, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retreat. When famine had so farre preuailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and sawdust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leave, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leave, yielded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Countrey. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had referred themselves to the euent, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noyfull smell of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley, that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be vnto her as a house of torment, and a laile, out of which she should not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted

her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Cassander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Haue, accounted himselfe as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yelled to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonius (to whom Olympias had giuen charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Countrey, taking courage from the successe of some petty seruices wherein he had preuailed) began to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Cassanders fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did so, and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innouation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, shee her selfe was called into question, and accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so styled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie she called iustices) by her committed. There was she (being nor heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those who on she had slain. But it was at Cassanders instigation; who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessaries, to saue her selfe by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her selfe, and tell her owne tale; he dissembled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, vnto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, vnto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages, a stout Lady, and of vnreprouable chastitie; but her ambition was boundlesse, her hatred vnappetitable, and her furie in reuenge, most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wiues and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuate to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beaustly fury broiled the other aliuie in fire, in a copper basin. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her well) forbad her to meddle in the gouernment of Macedon. But God more seuerely vnto cruell Tyrants, than onely to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfill the rest of her wickednesse, (which was his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others,) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

†. IIII.

Cassander celebrates the funeral of Arideus and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

AFTER her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Arideus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thesalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wiues; that by her he might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her yong sonne, to close prison, remouing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase loue; built a Citie, called by his owne name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He reedified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had liue twenty yeeres waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily preuailling in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

The journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that ioyned with him.

EUMENES, hauing ioyned vnto his company the Argyraspides, made halte into the Easterne parts. to take possession of thole Countreies, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his journey through Callosyria and Phenicia, hoping to reclaime thole Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath bene shewed) by Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was so great, his Armie too little; and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectually. The Captaines of the Argyraspides were so slowward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so vnsteady, that he might more easily haue dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore he fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich paulion, wherein an emper throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had bene present at their consultations. Thus he freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that hee was not to relye vpon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected then his affaires required, and were not to be dealt with by persuasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrey of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, hauing in vaine assailed to hinder him, by opening the flues of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Pencestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them; euery one finding matter enough, to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of assembling in one paulion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means he won to himselfe many of thole, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

How Antigonus, coming to set vpon Eumenes, was driuen off with losse.

ANTIGONUS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he remoued out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered, and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, & was retired back toward Persia.

keeping the River of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he took. Before he came to Tygris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he fought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yielded themselves prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off, and the heate of that Countrie in the dog dayes, breeding diseales in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him, (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to goe the neerest way, passed through Luage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his troups that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A battaile betweene him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Saine he would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captains of the Argyrasides or Silver-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Pencestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countreies, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Pencestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Soldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiving whereunto these doings tended, suffred him a while to keepe good cheare, till the time of war drew neerer. Then did he saine an Epistle, directed as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Pencestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polyperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingness to follow Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being faire the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and saine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to haue bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiving him a farre off, could not refraine from giuing him deserued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus, otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable success, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to ye farre from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victory; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies craving it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

§. III.

Of diuers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Hus did the Waire continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the side which had hitherto preuailed, being hindred by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. Hee knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies iourney, but very bad, through a rough drie wildcrustle, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring 25. daies iourney, he forsooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come vndiscovered. So therfore taking his iourney in the dead of winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because hee would not haue them deseried a farre off. This commandement had bene well obserued foure or five daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neere to their waies end. The light of these fires gaue notice of their coming, which being reported to Pencestes, and other Captaines, they were so astonished with the sodaine danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to haften his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleeue him, yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, where with he occupied certaine tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there hee chose a vniuent ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had bene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long & painfull iourney. Therefore he resolved to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that some what or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had bene so deluded. Therefore he went against these troups with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not bee forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his enemies, sent aboue two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus beeing fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himselfe as well as he could; for his horsemen, ouerlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spur. Neither knew they, who sat vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they receiued wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troups of horse and foot, that came v unexpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

§. V.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Capitaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with envie, that they could no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief contriued against worthy men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deserting: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serue to counterpoyle great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet hee shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisdom, to finde good reason of the euills, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtly, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and careful by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrew him, which euenty they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly aduertised by Eudamus, to whom hee had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom hee liued to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discomfiting with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, hee reuolued many things in his minde, being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to secke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length hee resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betweene Antigonus and Eumenes.

HIS Souldiers, especially those olde bands of the Siluer-Shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet hee ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to ioyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice vnto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse in fighting against their owne Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Siluer-Shields were men of threescore or twenty yeeres olde, and strengthened more by continuall exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often bene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensiue, and advanced heauily, suspecting their owne cause, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine levelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, hee did set forward courageously against the enemies, that were ready to giue him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to feede the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the foedaine; and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retreat, expecting the euent of the other side.

So they ioyned very fiercely, Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victory vpon his open enemies as might giue him leisure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being euen in their owne opinions, farre inferior to the whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Siluer-Shields, who slew about five thousand of them, losing of their owne not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that hee could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet his countenance wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enemy could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battell, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter hee did beat vpon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in suspense, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hindred the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betwene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not onely haue defended them, but peradventure haue surpris'd those which came to surprise them, and so haue done as good a piece of seruice as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in body and minde, that hee could not possibly giue an eyre to euery place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe euery way ouer-charged, beganne to giue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe, as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soon as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to ioyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where hee might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Pithon, willing him to set vpon the Siluer-shields in their retreat; which yet he forbore to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoyle which he got, by surprizing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

§. VII.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slaine.

Eumenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanor that day had so crushed the enemy, that hee had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wildernesse, ouer the high mountaines.

But these perswasions auailed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captains would needs returne into the high Countreies; and the Souldiers had no desire either to stand or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Tentamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times consented vnto traitorous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as hee thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those olde Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtle man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreaty, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore hee louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of farre greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more ioy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeem by another fight, in the middle of this goodly talke, they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so farre, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had bene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine, to send a guard of horsemen and Elephants, to keepe him from being smothered; whom hee could not sodainly resolute, either to kill or saue. Very few they were that liued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one; therest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saued, hee would soone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reuenge the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) haste of other busines made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the trauailes of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelitie, and patience laboured in vaine, to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his government of himselfe, in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertues, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered, by Caspar de Colligne, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the mal-lace of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deferred vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carry them into farre Countreies, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuy charge, to consume them all, as perished wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, on so much as once behold the Seas that beare vpon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Pithon, and occupied Media. How he remoued Governours of Prouincies, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

He two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men industriously bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to consider his owne defencings; for that the whole warre had bene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse there were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to asslay them with great liberality. But in following this course, hee was driven by necessitie to trust many, of whom hee stumbled vpon some, that were treacherer, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose disconcerted to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention betwene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countreies: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finelie delude Pithon. By his greatnelle with Alexander, his authority in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the loue of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; hee was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensive warre. But what need had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of olde acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelesly through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, hee appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this hee marched into Persia, where hee was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began hee to shew how well hee vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Governours in all Prouinces, leauing none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to bee dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme olde offences, but was deceived, hauing to doe with one that could not bee taken with such baits: hee was caried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer after tooke effect. Thus hee, that enuid the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, & now gave proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Capitaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendering vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleue it; but vied him with excessive kindnesse, for feare so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which added to his former store of money, made vp 25. thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which hee aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leaue no Country behinde his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, hee was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, becomming the Maiestic of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable; saying, That it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, whereof it was likely that hee should finde such issue, as Pithon and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fifty horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countiees were yielded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, hee wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophesie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Falsie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it bene true, me thinks, Antigonus rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preferred for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he tooke his iourne into Gilicia, where he wintered. There hee took vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yeerely income to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.*

§. I.

The combination of Ptolomie, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands and his answer.

THis great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, had priuily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices hee had some notice; the good good entertainment giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them seuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their loue toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie, it being likely that a good armie should preuaile more than a faime message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, he rooke the way toward Syria, & was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed, they held it very iust, that all should bee partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had bene all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betwene them all an equal diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to euen their liking, if he would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lyca, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellepont, to Lyfimachus; for whereas his owne Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victorie, he might well spare some of those western Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which hee had bene driuen so iniuriouly, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses receiued, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was hee so weake, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare onely, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to finde them worke, more then enough to defend their owne. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his means kept their gouernments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the councill of estate in Macedon. But what maruell was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitiue, and begging succour, he was by his meere bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said hee) in those daies command mee to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired mee to pittie him, and helpe him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumeth to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can hee complaine of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did vse him well; but his conscience told him that he had defrauded ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

§. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the Warres.

When the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soone as he were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea-coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia; giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnurnished of money, to draw friends to his side, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially, hee laboured to make himselfe the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreflowed his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to giue swift aduertisement of all occurrences, hee invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomie lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraigne enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrey, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these busineses he consumed a yeere and three moneths; nor idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his discretion, and well vsed. The strong Citie of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes, which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not alleepe, whilest these things were in doing, though hee kept himselfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unreadie) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus pulsed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many petty Lords, of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomie; the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharpe Steele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the sonne of Antipater, howeouer by the painefull and learned writer Reimerus Reineccius, he is by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomie and his Confederates, and busily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enioyed rest; but now he threw himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

8. III.

How each partie sought to winne the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon reuolteth from Antigonus who had vsed him as a p.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way soeuer it inclined was of great importance. Here in at the first, Antigonus spied to well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom hee wagged eight thousand, and caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse himselfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander, and not herewith contented, had shut vp in close prison the poore Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Thesalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vsuit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to ioyn in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had plained the Olympians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Cassandria; and had reedified the Citie of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by

by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her son, and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome; this he did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that to the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyaltye to the yong Prince, the world was too wile to be deceived with vaine shewes. His vndertaking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got easie beleefe, in regard of his present haire to Cassander. Yet heerein also Ptolomie stroue to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more seruicable in warre, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himselfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much blood shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which hee could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controversy; telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who pretailed, but onely desiring haue them to weary themselves, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wile, as to keepe in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receiue the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should bee freely put into his hands by Cassander. Prouided, that hee should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure & faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, & the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, he might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrey which his Father could not keepe, when hee was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste bee wonne by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud iniurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which he did not carrie very secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept to good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans control.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by severitie taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Armie in good order, and gouerned those places that shee held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Atolians rise against Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of Antigonus, utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. Antigonus drawes neerer to Greece.

A Antigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemie, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries in Greece, by stirring vp the Atolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greece Seas, by whose assistance hee might be the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Atolians, a factious Nation, & alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbour, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their own Countie; fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom hee vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many pettie Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Naue. Polyclitus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had bene sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his seruice in that Countie, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surpris'd. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to help his fellowes that were on Land; but whilst he with all his Fleet were intent onely to that businesse, Polyclitus appeared at their backs; who as soone as he perceiued their disorder, hastened about the Cape; and charging them behinde, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: so the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the warre, and thereby to haue equall cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the reuolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacy, made betwene the Atolians and him; as also those pettie skirmishes, that had bene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduers to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, monie, and shippes, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, hee prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomies his enemie, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse, wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people being tied vnto him by no bond of allegiance, might vpon small occasion reuolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To preuent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty yeeres old, hee appointed many ancient Captaines or assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest hee carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V.

§. V.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

H He comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the proceesse of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Scuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with mony: and other aide. The Atolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Acides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee sodainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to retaine vnto their former dutie. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Countie. Finally, hee ouercame Scuthes; and following the heate of his victorie, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men hee did either put to rancome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Atolians. For hee wasted their Countie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victory, fought againe with their forces ioynd in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Acides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee drave the Atolians out of most of their Countie, and forced them to seeke their safety among the wilde Mountaines. Of the Epirotes hee sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduersaries with painefull traualle; after which they remained onely suers. Antigonus himselfe at leisure, wanne all Curia the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty vpon all the Cities hee tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countie of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firme Land, were by those means wonne to be his in true and vehemēt affection, readie to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie in deede, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefite, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror hee forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakelie guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any forraigne succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countie; drave his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Gouvernour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before bene raised out of her old ruins by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had bene some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miserable nullitie, that held them vacapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomie by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which Ptolomie and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the prefence or neerenesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece; so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, where with in the yeere preceeding he had ouer-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wauered betwene contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another to Ptolomie, was visited by an Egyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his owne appointment, Gouvernour of the whole Countrey. With the same fleet hee ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, waisting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoyles of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subiects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking onely his Horse and light-armed foote with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tire himselfe and his followers, in haste seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many daies, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certaine, whether hauing lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return vpon those maritime Countreys, or make towards Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Army, which he leued with all conuenient speed, for the recouerie of Syria. This was more then Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Armie, to giue him battaile. Heereupon hee called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a yong man, and weakly furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomie & Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gaucit, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his own title waighy enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that shuld moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoyle and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome iourne ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomie and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Prouince, as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessities, that their Armie felt not any great grievance of the euill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they vnderooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vnterly vnprovided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chaines, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, (which besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that yeere, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iourneys, or long and dulling expectation,) they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striving more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no necessity would needes fight a battaile with disadvantage, began to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight she was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and preuailed little, till now perceiving that all mult lye vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their lastie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilst they were forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, and cloyed vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch others, to carry out what they had already laden, Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Cities together.

This victory restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatness of Seleucus. For betwene Gaza and Phanicia no place offered resistance. In Cilicia and Phanicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrrus by the Garrison, falling to murinie against their Captaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countreys, in the highest Asia. The Era of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

AS while Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which he found so favourable, that recouering first his owne Prouince, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine consisted of no more than eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small to haue bene placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needefull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the wals. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Gouvernour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countreys, had the like affection, others made a countenance of warre, which by ease compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves ioyfully to Seleucus. In a desertion to generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for euery man of them should haue bene troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismaied the rest, that that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betwene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now got to ten what he sought; it behooved him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needefull helpe, came with ten thousand foote, and seauen thousand horse, either to face all from being lost, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely foure hundred horse, and somewhat above three thousand foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations having yielded him many louing Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were nere to the River of Tigris, hee withdrew himselfe from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marishes not farre off, where he lay secretly waiting for some aduantage. Nicanor thought that he had bene fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine security, his campe was taken by surprise, the first night of his arriuall; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Capitaines, were slaine, hee himselfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Desarts; and the whole Armie yielded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an account much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Aera. The authentic of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the five hundred and nineteenth yeere of Nabonassar, was the fourescore and two yeere of this account. Other inference hereupon is needefull, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these yeeres was reckoned complete, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirte and eight yeeres after Nabonassar. With the obsequation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to haue bene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had obserued it, in the same yeere; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeere; and the last of the hundred thirte and seauenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that willfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in Historie, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnmembred fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet this much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeere, that is found betwene actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accounts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it than a yeeres distance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomie lost all he wonne in Syria. what the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had bene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

Na happy houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staid longer vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could haue spared him none at all. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courtesie message to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but onely tearmes of honour, wherein they would seeke to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Antigonus vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said, That the victorie which Ptolomie wan vpon a bearded Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon desire that his sonne, whom he tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomie hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his owne businesse in Caelosyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had bene already vanquished, when Cilles too much vnderualued the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, hauing lately faued his life by flight, would now be more carefull of hauing a faire way at his backe, than aduenturous in setting further forward, then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all feare; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meete with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march; he tooke the lightest of his Armie, and made his iournie with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit serued not onely to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomie, with equall fauour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomie so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius fo emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of consequence therupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomie; and therefore he fortified himselfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomie on the other side was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprise, wherein he might perceiue, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driuen to make a shamefull retreat, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haste, not so much to relieue his sonne, as to embrace him. For he reioyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, layed by his sonne; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomie had now lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to haue assailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation, as if he had d'ared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduised him to retire into Egypt; alleging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course, not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensive warre. So he departed out of Syria, preferring his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of feare: and he departed at faire leisure, not onely carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantel some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrey that he left at his backe, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great Province.

We may iustly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had ouer-run, with so hattie a course, as gate him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions for superioritye betwene the King of Israel, and thole of Damascus, betwene Agypt, and Babylon, Babylon, and Nineue, the Persians, and many Countreys; argue a more manly temper, to haue once bene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and againe recovered, by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if we shall consider, how the feuerall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possesed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their abilitye) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countreys had alwayes bene subiect vnto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had vterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all soueraigne power, or high authoritye, the life and spirit of euery Estate, they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had bene members.

Why the Persian Satraps, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, strue to lay hold vpon those Prouinces, which had many ages been subiect vnto them, & scarce foureyers in quiet possession of their enemies, or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, it not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may finde no lesse reason to suspect the Historie, than authoritye to confirme it. For we seldome reade, that any small Kingdome, preuailling against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compass of ten yeeres, as left vnto the vanquished no hope of recouerie, nor means to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vter confusion hath ensued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set downe by Machiavel; and concerne all other Kingdomes, that are subiect vnto the like forme of Government: the summe whereof is this; Wherefoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of slaues, there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile so farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren he vseth not to suffer aliue) were taken or slaine: the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassas, how great soeuer they may seeme, are meere slaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of priuate gaine, should not countervaille all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Countrey, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall blood, there are in that Kingdome store of great men; who are mightie in their feuerall Countreys, and haue certaine Royalties and Principalties of their owne, are able to raise warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwayes stirre vp and inflame them: so that vntill euery one piece were won, and euery one (an endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought vnder or destroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they soone returne to their old allegiance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not to feare any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischief that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath spent his fling, and must either flye to the enemye, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must aduenture to excite himselfe vnto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not striven by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so ioyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subiect vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him assistance, if aduersitie should make him stand in neede of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turkes Bassas, or prouinciall Governours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse and vter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subiect, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerour, who hath no other deuce painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slaverye.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of libertie in the Subiects, and vterly destitute of other Nobilitie, than such as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall blood, and others, descended from the Princes that ioynd with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation consisted onely in their Pedigree, and their safetie in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaues, and so did stile themselves, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaues, it is easie to be discerned, in that example of crueltye, practised by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Masses, which hath bene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satraps, or Governours of the Prouinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, prouing them to haue bene meere slaues: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie conuenient among the people: a matter no lesse auailable, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, then is the cause assigned by Machiavel. For as Afope his Assie did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should loade him with heavier burthens, then his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor

Nor will be haffie to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had beene long accustomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoignes beare ſuch faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iurisdiction in Lombardie; for the Townes that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreſſours: and this did cauſe the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene ſubiect vnto the poſteritie of Alexanders followers, to ſerue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were caſed of many burthens, which had beene impoſed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So it of this tameneſſe, which we finde in thoſe that had beene ſubiects of the Persian Kings, the reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene abſolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: againſt whom Antigonus ſent part of his Armie; thinking the: ewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaines that he ſent, ſell vpon the Nabathians, at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrr, Frankincenſe, and other ſuch commodities. All or moſt of theſe rich wares, together with ſixe hundred talents of ſiluer, and many priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their coming was ſuddaine and vneſpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabathians ouertook them, & finding them wearie with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of foure thouſand foote, and ſixe hundred horſe, onely ſixe horſe ſcaped. To reuenge this loſſe, Demetrius was ſet out with a greater power: yet all in vaine, for he was not reſiſted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a vaiſte Wilderneſſe, lacke of water, and of all things neceſſary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he loſt not much honour: for they craued it, and gaue him preſents. Returning from the Nabathians, he viewed the Lake Aphalites, whence he conceiued hope of great profit that might be railed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his ſonne, Antigonus was well pleaſed, and appointed men to the worke: but they were ſlaue by the Arabians, and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſſe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage againſt Ptolomie: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loſſe of thoſe great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it ſafe to tranſport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Aſia ſhould haue beene expoſed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle couſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius, with ſixtene thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, was ſent againſt Seleucus. Theſe forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his ſonne did leſſe. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelues from neceſſitie of fight; ſome places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without ſetting in Garrifon more men than he could ſpare, neither did he get much; and therefore was ſaine to ſet out the brauery of his expedition, by burning and ſpoiling the Countie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne aſſured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his ſonne a peremptoric commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeeme) that in ſuch an vnſetled ſtate of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the furie of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would be vaine to ſtrive againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of neceſſaries ſhould fruſtrate the valour, that by ſtrength of time was like to become leſſe terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leauing behinde him ſixe thouſand foote, and a thouſand horſe, rather to make ſhew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himſelfe, with greater forces could doe little more than nothing, forſooke the enterpriſe, and went backe to his Father.

A general peace made and broken. How all the houſe of Alexander was deſtroyed.

THEſe ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themſelues with vneffectuall tra- uail, in ſeeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them ſhould hold quietly, that which at the preſent he had in poſſeſſion. As no private hatred, but mere deſire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; ſo was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulneſſe growing vpon the flow aduancement of their ſeuerall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occaſion might better ſerue to fight againe.

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a ſaure, but a falſe colour, to the buſineſſe; That the ſonne of Alexander by Roxane, ſhould be made King, when he came to full age; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at liberty. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdom, ſeemes to haue beene a matter, forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcouered a purpoſe, to make himſelfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Caffander. For in his cuſtody was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in ſort anſwerable to their degree; but as cloſely priſoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had ſene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that ſought to put them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutual hatred and feare betwene them, rooted in theſe grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected, vpon this concluſion of peace, grew vp ſalter than any time before, in the heart of Caffander: who ſaw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the ſonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince muſt firſt haue poſſeſſion of Macedon: whereby Caffander ſhould be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine over a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridanus, or better, as being better acquainted with their owne ſtrength. He in the meane time, by his readineſſe to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himſelfe from that ill-faoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of reſtoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto beene the ſubiect of much idle diſcourſe: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held ſcarſe any Towne of theirs, Caffander occupied moſt of the Countie: which if he ſhould ſet free, he muſt be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell againſt him, as againſt a Diſturbur of the common peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Countie lying betwene Euphrates and the Greece ſeas, together with a great Armie, and money enough to entertaine a greater, might ſeeme to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to riſe his hopes, as high as euer they had beene.

With much diſaduantage doe many men contend, againſt one that is equall to them all in puiſſance, Caffanders friends had liſt him in an ill caſe; but he could not doe without: for where euer yone mans helpe is neceſſary to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can ſtand out alone, when all the reſt are weary. The beſt was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no ſuch end as the becomming Subiects vnto any man; much leſſe to the ſonne of an Aſiaticque woman, of whom they had long ſince reſuſed to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a ſhort couſe, and cauſed both the child and his Mother to be ſlaue: freeing thereby himſelfe in a trice, from the dangerous neceſſity of yeelding vp his gouernment, which he muſt haue done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of ſingular beauty, which was perhaps the cauſe, why Perdiccas deſired to haue her ſonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately vpon the death of Alexander, ſhe had vſed the fauour (if it were not low-) of Perdiccas, to the ſatisfying of her owne bloody malice, vpon Stathira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewiſe married according to the cuſtome of thoſe Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, ſhe did, by aſſiſtance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Siſter, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she & her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion, euen at such time, as the nere approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euery one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each to ment to improve his owne stocke. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrison into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at liberty. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia, where he wan foure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his enemies.

After this putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requital of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had bene to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at liberty, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece in sile: where hauing first free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised to great expectation of finishing the long desired worke, that Crateispolis, the Widow of Alexander, *Polyperchon*s sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceived a vaine belife, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby with little labour, their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long seruitude had well nere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer freedom, had forted their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit thereof; but late idly still, as willing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Towne with wals, trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had bene a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had bene, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honour of Demetrius Phalerus, as there were daies in the yeere. This Demetrius was now their Gouernor, and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spite of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Countie stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to their owngood, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of monie and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as iudging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke so the worke in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon, and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had bene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his owne aduantage, of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger, & made those those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made for great a stirre in the reigne of Aridaneus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, but had bene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders only liuing child, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalte, was deemed very iust and honourable. There were indeed more hearts then hands, that ioyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not bene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceiued to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polyperchon himselfe, with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he preuailed so far, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill, choosing rather with many curses, and soule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of his own Armie; than to purchase a Noble fame with dangerous traualle, in maintaining his faith vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while bene asleepe; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe witness, of his hauing beene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Cassander incur the generall hatred of men by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the most powerfull: or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomie sweat, in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue afforded them leisure, and hie thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers: looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to reuolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whercon their owne should haue depended. Against this enuie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to giue him a goodly tide to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardis: whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howe soeuer the discomer much vnwillingnesse therunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it onely for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsion; meanes: either because his fancie being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, wherunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had bene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia, hoping belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those brave Capitaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie widow, suffered her blood, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a iest: saying, that she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner, void, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had bene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired onely a proper man, with whom she might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haile; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long carrying, she had her choise of all the great Commanders: Amigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Amigonus excepted) had wiues already; Ptolomie had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom herepected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindered not his suite: peradventure it aduanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iourne from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; hee had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had been the way, by which he might haue incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome; it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we neede not aske: for seldome is that bloody crime vntil it be revealed, and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

This was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the cruelty of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soone after cast downe, ouer-whelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequelle will declare.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrison of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

One being left aliue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Prouinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely profess themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill becomed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it conuenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatness by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefulfull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprize, euen the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royalty, whereof in seeming modestie, hee was not courteous. To this purpose, he deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fise thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrey free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance hee entered the Hauen; it being thought that a flecte of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had bene arriued. But when it was knowne, both who hee was, and what was the cause of his coming; the ioy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalerus forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; onely the Garrison in Munychia stroued to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the obseruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratesipolis lay in Parras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius, hoping, belike, that she might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie; to whole Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the onely businesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrey of Megara, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long iourne to meete with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when shee came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might ouerthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any teames of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their proiect fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly vpon him, that he had no better shift, than to mustle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised, leauing them to ransacke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of conditions; specially an extreme dissoluteness in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industry in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. For aduersitie made his valour more active: prosperity puffed him with ouerweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till she had wound vp the thread of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assaile Munychia by force; that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by conuinuance of the assault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that scoured the wals, preuailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two dayes. The wals, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their liberty, with promise to aid them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lower, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuering to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the gods their Saviours, ordaining that euery yeere, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods, like as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a fruitles diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handsonely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vntlesse he would seeme to approue their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ships; he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

§. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a businesse of greater difficulty; meaning to imploy his seruice against Ptolomy in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsaile, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Countrey. About the same time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as hee would not permit any other to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to holde his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that hee should conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pitifull Tragedy had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Ile. Nicoles, king of Paphos, was entered into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so farre that he thought himselfe past excuse, by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicoles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yielded to the death. Nicoles offered to cleare himselfe; but Menelaus tolde him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity, caused the vnhappie King to rid himselfe of life: and his death brooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew herselfe, but perswaded the wifes of her husbands brethren to do the like. Altho those Brethren of Nicoles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the sodainnesse of this calamity, did shut vp the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was, Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cyriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves haue the rule of their owne Countrey. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within the wals of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Island. His greatest helpe at the present, was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good vsage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Aegypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution haue stood long, against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery; if Ptolomie had not hastied to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried a farre; though more then halfe of it was vsnt for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatening message: willing him to be gone, vnlesse he would be ouerwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant repaid him with words of as much brauery, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sydon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eightheene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomy; better stored with weapons fit for that seruice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prowes, to beate vpon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of threescore Gallies that lay in the Hauens of Salamis, lest Menelaus with them should set vpon his backe: in which case, it was very likely that all should go very ill with him. Against this mischiefe, he bestowed ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to giue what assistance they could, he with the rest of his Fleet, pursued Sea against Ptolomy.

The fight beganne early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleet. Each of them preuailed against the Squadron wherewith hee encountered; but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves vnto speedy flight. As for Ptolomy, hee was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might releue and animate those of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his losse ouer-great to be repaired, by contending any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he labored only to saue himselfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile no vnusuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue bene expected. The occasions whercof were, partly the great skill in Sea-feruices, which the Greekes and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, aboue those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, when in consisted no lesse, than in the quality of those with whom they were manned. Further, wee may reasonably iudge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolomies Army, did not more encourage his owne men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloof. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossefled with vaine conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was vnto them frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauens: which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in Fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that finde some part of their fares vaine, do easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their own ability, to do more then they thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomy had no more then eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken, or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strue against the violence of Fortune, but yielded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelue thousand foote, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Hauens of Salamis. The same defection of spirit was found in the common Souldiours, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had serued the Egyptian by Land: none of them repelling any more confidence in Ptolomie, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleued, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the M-ssage of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: Hee caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately backe to the ships; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly that no part of his tydings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriual (for it was not knowne where he had bene) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure demure Gentleman. Thus marched hee faire and softly forward with a great throng at his heeles (that serued well to set out his Pageant) vntill he came in sight of Antigonus, who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meete him at the Gate, and heere the newes. Then did Aristodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voyce salute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pomp, as before hee had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loude acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus and his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus, in requitall of the long supplication, wherein Aristodemus had helde him, sayd, that it should also bee long ere hee receyued his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, hee could not with a fayer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his ionne.

When it was once noyced abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their fellowes were ready to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the losse of a flect; therefore they saluted him also King. Lyfimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now hee vsed the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented with his owne name; wherby howsoever he might shadow his pride, hee no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house. But the name which hee forbore, his ionnes after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill successe, as will appeare, when they shall enter vpon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and iudgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Warres betweene the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedonia, Thrace, and others: vntill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with ill successe.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as becoming his greatnes: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eighteen thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a flect of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land-forces he commanded in person: of the Navy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the journey, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which hee had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soone changed into Seleucia by his mortall enemy) and came to Gaza, where hee met with his Fleet. The next day he drew to Egypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. Hee caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes provision of Viualles; and had manie Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desert, out ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cajus, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many shippes wanting. It had bene sorely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen backe to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creekes, as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirsty and Seabeaten Souldiers receyued reliefe. After these painfull traualles, there followed a warre no lesse painfull to little purpose, for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guardes should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertain the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assailed the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine, Ptolomie assailed the faith of his souldiers with good successe, for with great gifts and greater promises, he ferried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt will attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments, but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his armie further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already bene won from him. To preuent therefore as wel the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forst retreat, he secretly practised the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeede lesse preiudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, bee laid on Countflos & Capitaines, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vaifall. Charles the first, as many other Princes haue done, laide the losse and dishonour he receiued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Prouence, to Antonie de Leua, whether iustly or no, I know not; but howsoever, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that braue Captaine his life. Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doubtful enterprises, is rather a testimony of loue, than of wiledome, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue sometime knowne it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, haue not onely bene dissuaded, but held in a kind by strong hand, from hazarding their owne persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer bene called to a Marshalls Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

HIS departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of ioi in Egypt. Ptolomie held a solemne Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, laden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lyfimachus, and Cassander his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defenseless Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the ioyes of his enemies for witness of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare saucers by the last bargain, and himselfe, as he supposed, hauing lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retraite. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashion, for that which hee could not cleaue a-funder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolved (leaving the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the

the forenamed Confederates should be forth, either to relieue, or to lose; and hereby hee doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and there a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it further, and kept on the Seas a Fleece of well armed shippes, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and pettie Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that fought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselves to some one, and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Aegiptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonius his disposition, greaces, and neighbourhood was fearfull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrell to Antigonius, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettie injuries, of taking some of their shippes, with such other grieuances, while hee made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, hee employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terror vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship, and honor, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoever Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, & not by loue; raised his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many shippes of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed vpon a State already conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolute to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the seuerall ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, hee sett in hand with his Engines of battérie; in the inuention and vse of which, hee did neuer shew himselfe a greater Artisan, then in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole yeere, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proued faire more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hercunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprize, but by a strong and well composed armie, which he himselfe ledde as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed & endangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse success) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Asians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which hee had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lyfimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most reliefe, they consulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hermion, gaue the same faire answer for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; so was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonius and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A madde age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius preuailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonius, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against Antigonius.

Demetrius comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylae. Herein his reputation did much auale him, which was so great, that five thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, hee recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those parts, and giuing libertie vnto the people, hee bestowed vpon the Athenians those places, which had bene fortified against them, to blocke them vp. Then went hee into Peloponnesus, where hee found the like, or more easie success: for hee suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Countrey, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old place into another place, and called it after his owne name Demetrias. This done, hee bestowed himselfe to his pleasure. At the Isthman games, hee caused himselfe to be proclaimed Capitaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had bene in former times: whereupon (as if hee were now become as great as Alexander) hee despised all others, making it a matter of iest, that any, saue himselfe or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behaviour he was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leising, hee desired none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as euer to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, that whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and iust with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonius, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the warre should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoid, hee knew no better way then to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose hee sent Embassadors, but had no better answere from Antigonius, then that hee should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in solliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found hee them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lyfimachus knew that since Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soone be master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of thit, which was like to befall them, if Antigonius were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonius had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a flocke of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. Helay at that time in his Towne of Antigonis (a name that it must shortly loose) where hee was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lyfimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lyfimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while hee himselfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lyfimachus passing the Hellepont, began to make hot Warre vpon the subjects of Antigonius; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him, by faire means: winning others by force, and wasting the Countrey round about.

To repress this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonius made hastie iournies, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to driue Lyfimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lyfimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping ping himselfe the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourney: which enforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, & bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yeeld vpon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leysure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aid from Pholomie, that was ioyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which hee readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end hee might not bee driuen to leaue any part of his Army for defence of the Countrey; and that his iourney might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should bee at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so ridde of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found meanes to cleere himselfe of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himselfe to the trial of the maine contention in Asia.

§. IIII.

How Antigonus was slaine in a great battaile at Ipsus, neere vnto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

Seleucus, with his sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferior to that of the Enemy. In greatness of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Chiall) they were rather vnsufferable, than vnequall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had bene reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and enriched the Art of war with many inuentions, which euen his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, & leauesly stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iourney; and Lysimachus; that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Tracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough, to receiue any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy & well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty yeeres had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreame danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discerne no other necessity of fighting, than the obsequie qualitie of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and threecore and fiftene Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand foot of him in number of their foot, in horse they had the oddes of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and a hundred and twenty armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had auailed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensiue, communing much in priuate private with his sonne whom he commended to the Armie as his successor: whereas in former times he had neuer been so iocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priuate to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either teogoing the fight, or afterwards deuised, I hold it needlesse to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battaile, a busie goddess in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue bene thrust into the fable, if any matter, neerely resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleue, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well-neere all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith euery story aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorabile things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good success, that he neuer gaue ouer his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this aduantage, he enterposed his Elephants, betwene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many troups of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wheresoeuer it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to reuolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairly inuited, than to sustaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then foure-score yeeres old, very fat and vnweildy, so that he was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. He had about him some of his most trusty followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceived a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder company meanes to charge you; hee answered, well may they, for who defends me: but anone Demetrius will relieue us. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his sonne should come to the rescue, hee receiued so many Darts into his body, as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great ability in matter of Armes, together with his vnassatiable desire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed insolence towards all alike, as if it had been some vertue neerest representing a Kingly Miestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsooke him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeouours of their Vassals, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: shall find themselves vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue onely that staies by aduersitie) not onely the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part hee left it to be verified vpon his sonne.

§. V.

How Demetrius forsaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomie, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entering into quarrels.

How Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost; was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse and fixe thousand foot, by a speedy retreat vnto Ephesus, whence he made great haste vnto Athena, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilst he was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Cities. These were Embassadors, not Theori, or Consulats (which the Oracles). It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie; with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersity despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends.

Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauē, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall liue to teach them their old language, and speak vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he failed to the Illyrius, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrison was euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King onely of a small Armie and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerors, and those few places which as yet held firm (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong foeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briars, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof he gaue all the spoyle that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing bene too great to be repaied againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomie nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise deuicid from his owne Territorie, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order bene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which, neuertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found to fauor too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slain Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storie of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempred, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discouered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance betwene Seleucus and Demetrius; betwene Ptolomie and Lysimachus; betwene Demetrius and Cassander; betwene Demetrius and Ptolomie; though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betwene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betwene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those old times bene found more faithfull, then those of the same later times haue bene, as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan and others, the Reader may obserue: betwene whom from the yeere of our Lord, One hundred and foure hundred, and fiftie, when Charles the eighth vnderooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeere one thousand fiftie hundred fiftie and eight, when Henry the second died; the Histories of those times tell vs, that all the bonds, either by the bed, by the booke, either by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius escape this probity by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recouered Cilicia from Ptolemy, the brother of Cassander, who had gotten it of his share in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entered vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should haue done against the common enemy. So Ptolemy with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Cassander, whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the same time hee tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (plurality of wiues being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Easterne conquests) and so was hee by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then strengthened with two friends, for neither of them withheld him any good, otherwise then might seeme to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them haue bene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune somewhat farther off, than settle his estate vnder their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe: and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Ile of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine haue let his new father in Law vpon the necke of Lysimachus; or whether he were indeede greedie of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keepe as much Land as he could, hauing already found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusal so displeased Seleucus, that in angry termes hee demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendered vnto him; which were the onely places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. Instead of giuing them vp, Demetrius tooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouercome a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father in law for two Townes, from whom hee had already taken more then well he knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends out of enuie to the stronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius won the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the liberty, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempred Citie was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furie. He brought against them all the force that he could well spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any business, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse, and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where he wan diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrey of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals, being all destitute of means to keepe such a Naue, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomie, who (trusting thereby to win the loue of Greece) had laden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to relieue

the hungry Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deal with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hastened them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neere, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was to extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Moule, which dropped downe betweene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeld vpon the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not onely forbear to take away the liues of these vnthankfull men, which they had submitted vnto his mercy, but out of his liberality gaue them foode, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuertheless he was growne wiser then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, & dispose of them at his pleasure, he was ready to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a sure Garrison within their walls, to keepe them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedamonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their Citie: when the dangerous newes called him in all haste, of Lyfimachus and Ptolomie, that prevailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lyfimachus had wonne many Towns in Asia, Ptolomie had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilst he was thinking himselfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two younger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Thefolonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed but affected to Alexander, then to her elder sonne: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his own Mother. The odiousness of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queens death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lyfimachus, whose daughter he had married, that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forreigne aide. For which cause he calld in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius, who how they dealt with him, it wil soone appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had bene one that shuted well for himselfe, at such time as eury man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom he could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty, that the vsed against his friends, both alie and dead, as it made him aduenture vpon shedding the Royall blood; wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carelesnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindered his purpose, argues him to haue bene rather skillfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a far off the dangers, that may quickly passe away: and seeks to auoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill becometh Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men, deserved to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iusticia brought twores vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassanders children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prenailes in warre against the Greekes, Leseib reputation in his warre against Pyrrhus, and in his ciuill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lyfimachus made him, his Arme yeldes to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lyfimachus.

Pyrhus, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Acides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preferred, being a sucking Infant, from the forie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glaucias, King of Allyria, the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so faine from terrayning Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeeres of age. Within the compasse of sixe yeeres, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subiects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him awhile in his warres, was with him in the great battaile of Issus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus, and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Aegypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife, so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus, more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betwene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that he had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countie, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfy Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Arme, and finde no worke for it. This was a fruolous complaint, whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this ouer-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleueed it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had bene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lyfimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to secke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grievously storied, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he storied; vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his trouble some life. Thus he in haste, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wife course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Government: but thought (as shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King lifted. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing iustice. Hee had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as fixe yeeres reigne is long to him, that knows not how to reigne one yeere) hee discouered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their Citie twice in fighting to space, but vsed his victorie with mercy. Against Lysimachus hee would haue done somewhat (the peace betweene them notwithstanding) at such time as hee was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this iourney purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrhus, with no better, or rather with worse enie. Pyrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeede as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessalie. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-turre his enemies Countrie, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe; which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, shewed in single combat against Pantarchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeited manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, saue Pyrhus, is like him in deede, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to disesteeme, not so much in regard of his vnprofitable iourney into Epirus (for hee had wasted much of the Countrie, and brought home his Armie in good case): as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparrell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not onely too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and seruing chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers liues hee was reckless: and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth, That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iustice; and (as it were), to publish vnto all his Subiects, how little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, hee led the poore suiters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, hee throw all their writings into a Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that hee could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courtes hee grew so odious, that Pyrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to haue some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, hee did not (for hee could nor) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horses with a Nauie of five hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had bene seen before; yet so swift and vsfull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious son of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once preuailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrhus had won Berthea. The matter was not ouer-great: were it nor, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike: All the campe was in vsfure: some wept, others raged, few or none did forsake to utter sceditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wisest way, to leade the Macedonians further off from Lysi, to their owne countreiman, against Pyrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hastic as he; to meet with Pyrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his passion, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe abreasted in view of the campe, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arriual found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his Helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and professed their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius, onely some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attyring himselfe poorly, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe, deserring well this calamitie: whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behaviour depriued him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessitie truth.

Whilst Pyrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lysimachus came vpon him very vnseasonably, and would needs haue halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaine. The bargain was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole, as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better opportunity.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driuen vpon Seleucus, and compelled to yeelde himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

The Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had bene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie, though Phila his wife (who

(who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poyson her selfe, vpon desperate griefe for his misfortune. The first, vpon whom hee attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokesman; and taking faine words in stead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with cleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him with an Armie so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuouly impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which waies hee could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: neuertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore itularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lyxus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were diuened to trauaile with such speed as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countie; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his son in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battaile at Issus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betwene them; of which none took effect, through the iellousie of Seleucus. Therefore, mere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man, and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming beene discovered by fugitiues, that gaue alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, he was compelled by the list of those adherents (for euen some of those few forsooke him) to yeelde vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was such, as renewed his iellous thoughts, and hindered him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwife he vsed him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a demie-land, wherein were goodly walkes, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. Hee had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Onely his libertie was reserved vnto the comming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this fort hee spent three yeeres, lining merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and blood-shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then dyed, leaving to his sonne Antigonius, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth, his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

The death of Ptolomie, of Lyfimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Captaines: with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, did also Ptolomie King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom hee selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three yeeres before he died, that so hee might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of this house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuouly incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now onely two of Alexanders Captaines left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neere equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heate of admiration, began to harken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countie-man, that they forsooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had reigned about five yeeres alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne iellousie, and the insligation of a mother in law, caused him to poyson his Sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that Warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fiftene children that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountered by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heróes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So hee passed ouer into Macedon to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there hee ended his daies, and within seauen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his followes, by a bloudie death, being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentie and seuen yeere old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of olde Captaines, that had scene the daies as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them in the Art of Warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romanes, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe did euer encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we heere make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to enlue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome : and setting of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, vnto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

OW Rome was founded by Romulus ; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius ; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reigne of Tullus Hostilius : it hath bene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatness beginneth to encounter the power of Greece, and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes : I hold it conuenient (as in like case I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue bene deliuered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchild to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. Hee walled the Citie about, enlarged it with the hill Auentinus, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, &c the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixtene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twenty yeeres, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who auoyding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquiny, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife *Tanaquil*s propheticke, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, insomuch that after his decesse, he became not onely Protector to the children, but Governour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen : neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace : for he preuailed often against the *Tuscan*s, and from his victories, the chiefe ornaments of triumph rooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had bene left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, enforced the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sicknesse, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophesied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculanius and Ocrisia, a well delcended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, vntill his recouerie : which gouernement, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth ; among whom at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdome in as good sort, as if it had bene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous : and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had bene committed vnto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters ; hee (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the middle daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne ; and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned ; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage : who

foone concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where he thought by authority to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home fore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeeres. Then Tulla his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King ; returning home, enforced her Coach-manto driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes ; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising cruelty without iustice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators ; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Oerciculum, Suessa, Pometia, and the Gabii. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne betwene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heat of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman *Collatine*s wife : who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne bloud ; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, & Iunius Brutus) she kill'd her selfe : whereupon (chiefly by *Iunius Brutus*s his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depolled and banished ; and fledde to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie : in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fiftene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, enforced the people by soleenne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them : whereupon they rancked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double ; left perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motive to vsurpation ; and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Presiders : that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it to hard feeling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, scarce daring to asseue themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie would bee hereditarie, and supposing that the very name and affinitie with the house of Tarquine, fauoured already of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that hee might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eies, gaue liberty, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people : and that hee might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspition, caused his owne house to bee pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had bene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any waies deficient in matter of greater moment ; which concerned as well the peoples safetie, as their fauour : for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wisdome, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished Kings, hee caused them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to bee brought all vnparially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romans, hauing by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, wel appeased all libred quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their military designements, against Fortinairs, first, for their liberty ; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions ; and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betwene Latium and the *Tuscan*s, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, could not but giue occasion of offence to her neighbors ; smill by maine opposition, hauing preuailed against her borderers, she vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yeere of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria : who being ouer-persuaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Coles, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tybris ; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his followers, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porfenna although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Zaniculus, which is the verie entrance into the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assured his owne: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scauola (who hauing by error slaine Porfenna his Secreatarie, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorn of torments threatend, burne off his owne hand) he thought it not any whit preiudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field, and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastitie, not for beauty, mourned the losse of him one whole yeere. Into his place, for the residue of his yeere, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeere expired) Horatius Pulullus.

Tarquine, vpon his overthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strive against the frame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about fourteene yeeres, privately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tuscullanus, stomaching a-fresh at those old repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succor vnto the Tarquines, mulctured vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Anulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, partly for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cassius or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recouer againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no object of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeere after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate bankrupts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an vprore in the holy Mount; vntill by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themselves, they had continuall War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Aqui held them longest; who made Warre, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as derived from a great victory: although, by reason of the pouerty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would haue been ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bin no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Detius Minus, their Tribune, in their behalte, accused him, & after iudgement banished him. Coriolanus vssuing to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within foure or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Veturia, & Volumnia his Wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subiects to their Country, then friends to their sonne and husband, were more auailable to Rome, than was any force of Armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after pur to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, he died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; against whom the Fabij, three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had bin in a priuate quarrell. These Fabij, after some good seruises, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumvented, and all slaine: one only of that whole house, had been left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proceesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Manlius their Consull, with his whole Army, had bene discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinnatus cholen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honor in Rome, with successe and victorie in his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrey in the space of sixteene daies. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeeres before cholen Gouvernours of the State, and inactours of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would haue rauished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, C. p. taine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Heereupon the people, in an vprore, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new war, against the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuersitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and vterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie then fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yielding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yielded vnto him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Veij was ten yeeres, and so troublefome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad vnder beasts skinnes (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they receiued pay) and to make no v. ues neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their riches to Apollus Pythius: & the whole people in general, were called to the sanctifying of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, then before they had bene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequality in diuiding the spoiles: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of seruice, against the furie of the Gauls: who being a populous Countrey, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, destitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Routers ouer many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, set vpon Clusium, a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome hauing information, (and being careful of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such iniurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Romane Embassadors, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giuing a great overthrow vnto the Romans, by the Riuer Alia, vpon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for vn lucky, and call'd Aliensis in the Romane Calendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the Citie, some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifting for himselfe, ere the enemy came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conuayed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did seat themselves in Thrones, in their severall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had liued, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they tell to the spoyle, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they fate in their Maiesty, with a graue resolution:

having first reuerenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the Citie was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of feuen Moneths. Once they were like to haue surpris'd it by night, but being defcried by the gaggling of Gresus, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed vpon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungrie. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in waighing, the Gauls, with open insolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Capitaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this caulling came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gauls, with such violence, that hee dispersed their troupes, quenched the fire of the Citie with the sword, forcing them to restore the spoyle with aduantage, and forbore the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a fearefull Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable seruice, was afterwards accompted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their government from Consuls to militarie Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by ciuill dissension interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeeres expired, the Consular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeeres. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had bene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuoure the lesse, easily allowed off; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The families of the Papyrij and Fabij were most employed in the managing of this warre, which endured the space of fiftie yeeres. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Peturinus, and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurgus lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papirius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equall freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to haue one of the Consuls yeerely chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselves were Latine Colonies; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed; by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers aduertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul, exposed his life to the Enemie, and purchased victorie (as was beleueed by his death). In which kinde of deuoting himselfe for his Armie, the sonne of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decijs, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the liues of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countrey. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemie. For breach of which order he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had slaine a Capitaine of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Aqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, waisting all their Countrey with fire and sword, from the River Ner and Telua, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subiection.

The last of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediators, between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of Warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse peace, by them tendred. These threats which discouered their bad affection vnto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were vterlic subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained that certaine ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, ioyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subiects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to lend for Pyrrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which already, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which hee abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would haue desired. Hee had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnstedfast estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdome, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serue to giue some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very filly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing no other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselves vnder his protection. They had in their company, some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their feuerall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once hee answered Cyneus his chiefe Counsaillour, asking what hee meant to doe after cunctie of the victories which he hoped to get: that hauing wonne Rome, hee would soone bee Master of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickly get the Ile of Sicil; that, out of Sicill, he would passe ouer into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrey; and being strengthened with the force of all these Prouinces, he would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cynas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cynas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuerthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirty thousand men, well forced, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cynas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vnto carelesse to provide for the War. Wherefore he was faine to shew vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Arms, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their estate.

Whilest hee was occupied with these cares, Lauius the Romane Consull drew nere, and began to waste Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their own Countrey; the Samnites were careless of the haime, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselves; the Tarentines were better pleased than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of the ir vanting promises. Hee was now driuen, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiency, which by all means hee was careful to vp hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene scattered by soule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which hee resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Lauius the Consull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents should be ready to ioyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Assapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell betwene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neere distance, the weight of the businesse, which he had taken in hand, hee were delirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the Riuer of Sirius: Lauius intending to fight before the arriual of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that Riuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that hee had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the riuer, that he might not bee compelled to fight, vntill hee saw his best aduantage. But hee quickly found, that this new enemy was not onely skilfull in the Art of war, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armie entered the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, began to passe the Riuer, in sundry places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of the ir banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Armie had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dueie of a careful Generall; nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behoued him indeed to do his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but hee perceiving it, discomfited his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine ioy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as onely speare and sword were vied. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnsull forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiving their horse put to rout, and driuen out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of those strange beastes; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which consternation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victory was soone spread ouer Italy; and the reputation was no lesse than the fime. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consull, with a select Armie, should lose in plaine battaile, not onely the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely ascribed by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that hee tooke, in hauing the glory of this action peculiarly his owne, at such times hee blamed the Lucans & Samnites, for committing (as wee say) a day after the faire. Neuerthelesse, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than hee could many such victories. Therefore hee thought it good to compound with them, whilst with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent vnto them Cynas his Embassadour, demanding onely to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at rest, and himselfe accepted as their speciall friend. This did Cynas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captiues, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an olde and blinde Senator, did stirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answer, that whilst Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cynas made at his returne, of the Roman puilliance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed betwene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answer was, He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauing a more mighty army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to trial of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so ioyfull as the former had beene: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his vtter vndering. For hee had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile; and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor for any likelihood of preuailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilst hee should be driuen to spend vpon his old stocke. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwaies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Schollers in such learning, how to make them vnfructueable. Wherefore hee desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a slight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, forsooke Italie; wanne the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returnes into Italie; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes backe to his owne Kingdome.

When Ptolemie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, hee presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward vnto him, that had slain the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength & reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great verue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus, the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, & might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie nere vnto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to reuenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in monie then in Armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murthrer. While these three strout about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatening warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes hee strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting monie of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolemie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (counsaunting to haue them restored at two yeeres end) more for feare than for loue: that he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enioy his Kingdome.

Thus Ptolemie grew mighty on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes hee had gotten, by meanes as wicked hee increased.

All Macedon and Thraee being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her circumstance by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adoepe her children: a promise that hee meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he lew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found, vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard of. Belgus a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselves, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countreies that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeeres after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolemie, asking what he would giue: His answer was, that he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into their hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither paydon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; saying, that they would soone confute with deedes, the vanity of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that that he, who had giuen away part of his Armie vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should be so confident in vndertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gaules; but he scorned the offer; saying, that he had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victory must needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But hee soone found his great error, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none cleaped their furie. Ptolemie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battaile continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as lost. Onely Sophtes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindered Belgus from vling the victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King, which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldom come alone) the good successe of Belgus, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captaine of the Gaules, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fiftiee thousand horse; against which mighty Armie, when Sophones with his weak troupes made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leauing all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse then fiftie yeeres after the death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue vnkown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had bene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very reasonably had these newes bene carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretence of relinquishing his warre with the Romans; had not other tidings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agatharles, who reigned ouer the whole Iland, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had bene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoid slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, then to liue vnder the well knowne heauy yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agraguntines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

Igneued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the businesse of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleued (as came after to passe) that his aduantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicill he transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselves, yet not leauing them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subiection.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, then well ordered, or note-worthy. The Armie which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent in Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also won the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mamertines in battaile, he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Sosthenes (to whom his cruelty was suspect) out of the Iland, & put Theron of Syracuse to death, being zealous of his greatnesse, which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he serued himselfe, and salued the disreputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe against against the Romans, who since his leaving Italie, had well-neere dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, he embarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it selfe, by eightene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was farre more valiant then constant, and had he beene but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one Countrey or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would haue purchased no lesse honour than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him, for a greater Captaine, or a valiant man, hath beene no where found. But he neuer staid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IIIL

How Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, deliuered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhus wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonus.

The vertue of Sophenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the gouernment of Antigonus, than they had formerly bene desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and treasure bebecoming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driuen to vie against the Barbarians, onely those forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wishes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia, which were about fiftene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fllowes: and therefore sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet he iudged it vsfit to exasperate their furious choler, by vncurtuous words or vllage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous manner, with a royall feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such abundance of masse gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Campe and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauery serued onely to kindle their greedy appetites, who seeing his ships heauy laden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferior vnto the Gaules, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possellours, to spend the riches which they accompred assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoyle and purchase: which tale, carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his campe, where they expected a greater boorie, then the victory ouer Ceraunus had giuen to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arrival, and conueighed himselfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where he lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Campe forsaken, were not hastie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empie Cabbinnes of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speede towards the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilst he was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoyle of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in conert; and had saued it selfe by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of war: who discouering the much aduantage offered vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold vpon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselves into the seruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victory, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countreies, were ouerthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules in this place; and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I shall it neede lesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countreies which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had won this victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, then creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard tearmes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he fureto get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his warre against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had sved in brauery, were necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and six hundred horse: an armie too litle to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater then he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers scruolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrey. For Pyrrhus overtooke him in a freight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest prooffe that he was in retreat. The Gaules very brauely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemes that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour, tooke away their courage by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gaules, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort, which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged onely in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus, who discouered so well their affections, that he aduencured adventured to draw neere in person, and exhort them to yeelde. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he knowne where to leuie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his seruice; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to fflye from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirots, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

§. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

Pyrhus had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; there was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing liberty to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subiection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, then warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himselfe to Pyrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne younger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a iest; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had bene, indeede, the manner of their greatnesse, they sought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falshood, in Pyrhus, which they alwaies practised in wisdom, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Neuertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reuerse themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise then with armed Citizens, soone after this (it being built vpon vncuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with wals, at the present, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three dayes together it was assailed by Pyrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preferred the Towne the first day, where, in the violence of Pyrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindefull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had borne in sunder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Arenus the King returned out of Greece (where he had bene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrey stood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, then kindle in Pyrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third dayes worke shewed, how great his error had bene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meete the enemy in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise, to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Citill dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of seuerall factions to call in Pyrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerfull Assitants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argiues, that he came to saue them from the tyrannie of Pyrhus; and that he would be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrhus would needs perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argiues tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gaue Hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would giue none, to his inuiours: especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night vnto Pyrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both giue alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the wayes, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noise, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had bene combattant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeede, the comming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had bene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue backe, so did others thrust forward, and the Argiues pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrhus to make good his retreat, with his owne sword.

sword. The tops of the houses were couered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne sonne in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, she tooke a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground astonished with the blow, and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus, who forthwith possessed the armie, the body, and the children of his enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable funerall, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Heleenus his sonne; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posterity of Seleucus reigned ouer Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolomeus had quiet possession of Egypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, digested these, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

A discussion of that problem of Linie, Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

THAT question handled by Linie, whether the great Alexander could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Eastern conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bene, and is, the subiect of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides doe not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his dayes. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals iudgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of money, or of other needefull helpes in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled, and held the best part of Italy, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting onely matter of employment, coming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well settled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more,) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Cyrtanus, Eumenes, Ptolomeus, Antigonus, and Lyfimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded onely some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

this time, would haue bene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, he found the whole Countreie setled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serue in person; at whose call, the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; ^b another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for money. The Countreie lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were mere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquests) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Caesar himselfe doth witness, that the Gauls complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardinesse was ouer-maistered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their wals, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worke, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of opportunitie: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellowes; and sometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreme disadvantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall asunder: as in Iedes, vpon any little disaster, they were ready to beake, and retorne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great odds in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or what other worldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

John de Serres.

Let vs heare, what a French writer saith, of the inequality that was betweene the French and English, when their King John was ready to giue the on-set, vpon the Blacke Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. John had all advantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shew, Countreie, and conceit, (the which commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires: and which, the choice of all his horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with thirtie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriours. This I am sure of; that neither Syphax: the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Linie rightly termes them, nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthy partermes. All that haue read of Cressie and Agincourt, will beare me witness, that I do not relledge the battaile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe whereof hath left many a hundred better markes, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Mucker; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weaknesse, or sickenesse, or a fore finger, makes the Long-Bow vnersueicable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall he perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all obiection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Burts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be deliuered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceeth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wan so many great battailes, hauing no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victory of our men at Crenant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, vseth these words: The English comes with a conquering brauery, as though he, that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: he forceth our garde, placed upon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where he tels, how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and fise hundred of their owne men in English Callocks: hoping that the very sight of the English red Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Amylus, report wonders of our Nation:) the proposition which first I vnderooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, preuailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was assisted with all aduantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Caesar had done? my answer may be: I hope without offence; that our Kings were like to the race of the Acacide, of whom the old Poet Enuigues saith this note; Bellipotentes sunt magis quam sapientes potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: saue onely King Henrie the first, the cause of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule, before the time of Caesar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punicke, or after the Numidian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit opportunity, when vnder the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Tentones, by whom the Countreie of Gaule had been pitiously wasted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans sought for Dominion, with the Gauls, for preservation of their owne safetie.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, vntill they were Lords of all other Countreies, to them knowne. We on the other side, held onely the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation, (vnlesse perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) euery way equall to our selues; a Nation anciently and strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemy to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backs, where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a stronger inuasion by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces ouer Sea.

It is viall, with men, that haue pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great iniurie done to their iudgement, if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the diuident vertue of this our Iland, hath giuen more noble proofe of itselfe; than vnder so worthy a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Caesar a Monarch, so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath conuered our greatest hindrance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to wish, that auoiding vs, he had rather encountered as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a-side comparisons, we retorne to the rehearsal of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to strue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punicke warre.

§. II.

The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

THE Citie of Carthage had stood about fixe hundred yeares, when first it began to contend with Rome, for the mairtie of Sicill. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeeres in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great achievements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and fise hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subiected all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicill, and of Sicill, the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirty yeeres, before the destruction thereof by Sicilio: who besides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers referred, carried thence five hundred and seventy thousand weight of silver, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world, fore-shewes the dissolution of the whole.

whole. About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt : and by Gracchus it was called Æmonia : it was againe and againe abandoned and repopled, taken and retaken ; by Genesicus the Vandal, by Bellisarius under Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Ægyptians, and by the Arabometans. It is now nothing. The feat thereof was exceeding strong : and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, lauing that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land, which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith, three mile, and one furlong) by which we may beinduced, to beleue the common report, that the Citie it selfe was about twenty miles in compasse ; in that that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to haue bene twice as great.

It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie; and betwene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirty foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elk pinders, and all their food: out these they had stables for foure thousand horse, and Granaries for their prouender. They had also lodgings in these streets, betwene these out-walles for foure thousand horse-men, and twentiethouand foot-men, which (according to the discipline) vfed now by those of China neuer peltred the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Tyrsa; to which Strabo giues two and twentie furlongs in compass, that maketwo mile and a halfe. This was the same piece of ground, which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when she got leaue to buy onely so much Land of them, as she could compass with an Oxen hide. On the west side it had also the safe Sea, but in the nature of a standing poole; for a certaine area of Land, filled to the ground, on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but scauentie foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, hauing their ships and gallics riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common weale resembled that of Spauria; for they had titulaire Kings, and the Aristocratically power of Senators. But (as Regius well obserueth) they people in later times usurped too great authority in their Republics. This confusion in gouernement, together with the trust that they repoyled in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelties. * Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one haffe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle and mercifull persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people; to augment thir cruelties. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offeinded through ignorance: the one of these renderd them odious to their vassals, whom it made ready, vpon all occasions to rebell from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great loss received, haue desperately cast themselves with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of destruction, holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them haue dared, to manage their owne best proiects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceiued them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not onely the vnhappy Captaine, but euen him, whose bad counsaile had prosperous euent. The faults, wherewith, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, vnfaithfullnesse, and peritricie. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the triall bee referred vnto their actions. The first league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient : hauing beene made, the years following the expulsion of Tarquine. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing vpon the Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as haue trade, in some part of Affrick, nor suffer any shippes of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, vnlesse it were by force of tempest : whereas on the other side, no Hauein in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made longer after, which (howsoever it hath pleased * Liuet to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict then the former : prohibiting the Romanes to haue trade in any part of Africa, or in the Iland of Sardinia. Eu. Dec. li. 7.

By these two treaties, it may appeare that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keepe the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africa; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling all Italie, whereby they themselves might haue the better meanes to occupie all Sicill, whilst that Island should be defuncte of Italian succours. Hereupon we finde good cause, of the ioy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome preuailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mighty Army, consisting of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africa into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein: many great fleets were decoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians preuailed at one time, the Stilicians, either by their owne valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, & take reuenge vpon those Inuaders. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicill, then when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be lent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were buisie, in making their aduantage, of this good opportunitie; Pyrrius, invited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where he made sharp warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily forelaw, that the same buisie disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicill, as loone as he could finish his Roman warre. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were forry to heare, what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrrius; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by lending an Army into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirots.

It was indeed, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his work in Italy, that they might at good leysure, pursue their businesse in Sicill: which persuaded them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betwene Rome and Carthage renewed, with coucnants added, concerning the present businesse. That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reueration of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, using all meanes to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leysure to make a stepe into Sicill:
where, though in fine hee was neither getter nor sauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leauing them at his departure from thence, as farre from any end, as when they first began.

Many difflers, in an enterprife, that from the first vndertaking had bin fo strongly purfued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthageans to beleue, that an higher providence refifted their incroachment. But their defire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was fo innatuate; that with unwearied patience, they ftill continued in hope, of fo much the greater an harueft, by how much their coft & paines therein buried had bene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courfe; and

and by force or practice, recovered in few yeeres, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathocles, being entertained within Messina as friends, & finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that mere desperation, of finding any that would approue their barbarous treachery, added rage vnto their stoutnesse. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they ouer-ran the all the Countie round about them.

In this countie, at first, they sped so well, that they did not onely defend Messina against the Cities of Sicil Confederates to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather van vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbor places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her backe to these Mamertines, the Syracusians van fast vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messina, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It hapned ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betwene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Gouernors of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Armie elected two Gouernours among themselves; to wit, Artemidorus & Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeeres excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policie of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie hee vsed at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Gouernour. This Office, hee rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to climbe to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he fought, to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and retaining mutinous troupes of Souldiers without, often and easily moued to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wite the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messina, hee quartered all those Companies, which hee held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his hoste and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assaulted it in two severall parts, he marched away vnder the covert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the besieged: So returning home, and leauing an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trayned and obedient, he hastened againe towards Messina, & was by the Mamertines (who were proud by their former victorie over the Mutiners) incountred in the plains of Mylum, where hee obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves vtterly infebled, some of them resolved to giue themselves to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the severall factions dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone ready to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messina, whereof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, wastured out of doores, and the Towne referred for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messina, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once bene theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of iniuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the

Mamertines

Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messina: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whilst Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appian Claudius the Roman Confull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vtterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betwene Rome and Carthage; wherein, it will then bee time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, haue bene first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick warre. That it was vnjustly vnder-taken by the Romans.

HENRY Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to bee taken by the Epirots, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it in that busie time, sought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of 4. thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messina, (a Citie in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which ferueth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more severe profusion of iustice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatness) resolved, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopeless of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vsuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countie, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former libertie and estates.

This execution of Iustice being newly performed, and the same thereof sounding honorably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messina, desiring helpe against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who hauing both giuen example of that villanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with ioint forces to make it good, doe intreat the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to receiue from their fellow-citizens.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honestie or of profit, were to be followed; they euenmore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsells, and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterranean Islands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil it selfe; whilst also they feared, that Syracuse therein therein seated (a Citie in beauty and riches, little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safetie of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driuen to despaire by the Romans) should deliver vp Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betwene Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicily: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunitie of Messana was such, as would not onely debarre, all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicily; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a farre, did so preuaile, aboue all regard of honestie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Confull, presently dispatched away from Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and lesse moved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Island was ready to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well vnderstood: and against all this he thought the stiffe mettall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient remedie. Therefore, hee resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to send them away from the Towne, not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him. The Syracusan wanted not courage to fight; but surely, he wanted good aduice: else would he not haue hazarded all his power against an enemy, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that hee thought to get honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reigne. But he was well beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him, and his Kingdom in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana beene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must haue sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assilted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stocke, which it behooued him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Campe, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritie of his souldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsooke both field and campe, leauing all the Countie open to the Romans; who hauing spoyled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege vnto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of Warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre, not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict tearmes of lawfulness; whereupon they all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, witness by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folks, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrender, in the publique name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrender of themselves and their possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no company of Pyrates, Thieves, Out-lawes, Murderers, or such other malefactors, can by any good successe either villanic, obtaining the priuiledge of ciuill societies, to make league or truce, yea, or to acquire fine warre: but are by all means, as most pernicious vermin, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Catholicks, that Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can give protection to such states, as long as any other is vying the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming necessary to their crimes. Wherefore, we may esteeme this action of the Romans, so farre from being iustificable, by any pretence of Consideracie made with them; rather contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Thieves, into their protection, they iustly deserved to be warred vpon themselves, by the people of Sicily; yea, although Messana had been taken, and the Mamertines all slaine, ere any newes of the Consideracie had beene brought vnto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farr persuaded herein; that hee did put to sword all the Brachiade (a people in Sagelliana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they ioyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Companie of Milefians, who to gratifie King Darius, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countie, which these of their posteritie enjoyed. Neuertheless, in course of humane iustice, long and peaceable possession giues ius acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was first obtained by wicked means: and doth free the defendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Thieves, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should beacknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euery Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Matilde, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Niece of Edmund Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had to good) of iustice, in this quarrell, than had the Goths, Hunnes, Vandalis, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

Of the Island of Sicily.

†. I.

The qualitie of the Land: and the first inhabitants thereof.

He defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, since the first victories of Appian Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicily being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases wee haue obserued, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Island, which hath bene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

That

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adioyned to Italie, as a part of Bruttium in Calabria, neere vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest leuered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriall remaining, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caus'd by an earthquake; Silius and Cassiodorus, doe thinke it to haue bene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and furies of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubœa leuered from Bœotia; Castellum and Macris, from Eubœa; Silue here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall, and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Versteegens arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaulle. But for Sicil, they which leade it to caries to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Nip-tune (as Luitathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iocassus, the sonne of Aolus, diuided it from the maine land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Demie-Isle; that by that meanes, he might the more safely inhabit, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the Labour of fundering it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountains) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibraltar.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Luitathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soyle. As concerning the foune of this land, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeke, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole land was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of sowing and sowing of Corne: to Proserpina, not so much, for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus doe report for truth, that Pluto, as soone as shee vncouering her selfe, first shew'd her selfe to bee sene of him, gae her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrey, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where hee saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was a well-furnished treasure. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he, it hath usually clothed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armie, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoeuer Sicilie doth vield (saith Selinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-grown with siffion. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields neere vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this land, wheat doth grow of it selfe without any labour, or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in six Colonies, and sixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are founde iteratingly in many good Authors.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this land, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Atna, Scylla & Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides, the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lastrigones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill, all histories and fables doe ioynly with one consent auctore. Yee Thucydides saith, that these savage people dwelt only in one part of the land. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bredde in the Isle (although some doe thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe very constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelagi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the Continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this land, three hundred yeeres before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eighty yeeres before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the land; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Messina; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse it selfe, beate from thence the Aetolians, who long before had set vp a Towne in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not known, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the land from the Siculi. Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Aetolians thereof, but some hundred yeeres after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named; with Nea, Hybla, Trynacia, and diuers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes, who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These fate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill warre greatly infebled. Among these ancient stories, we finde the last voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Historian of vnquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many lands: and some such business, perhaps drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neere vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set vp in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which hee did with so great Art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be lying, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dadalus, prepares to invade the Terriorie of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his owne strength, promisth to deliuer Dadalus. This he performs not, but in the meane while, kills Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabit a part of Sicil; the better (as it seems) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engium, now called Gange; and these were the first Cities, built by the Greekes in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos serued with the Greekes at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans vnderstood, that their King had by treason bene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus; and landing neere vnto Camicus, they besieged the same five yeeres, but in vaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie; and having no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honour they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betwene the two famous Ports of Brundisium and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Tagmas and Messapij.

After the taking of Troy, Aegesus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troops into Sicil, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Aegisa and Elyma.

It is said, that Aneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Troians, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Aneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phenicians seized vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybaeum, and vpon certaine small Isles adioyning to the maine land: which they fortified, to secure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals haue done in the East India, at Goa, Ormus, Masambig, and other places. But the Phenicians staid not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greekes in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, hee findes orie and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phoenicia, Agypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Antiam, Typhon, and the like; as Danmark had Starchaterus, remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britania, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Leffrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also recite for fained and fabulous; did not Moses make us know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Defarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants; and were it not, that Terulian, S. Augustine, Nicophorus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plu-tarch, and many other Authois, have confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vesputius, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those parts. Againe, whereas the selfe same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on acorns and rootes, their poore cottages, the covering of their bodies with the skins of bealls, their hunting, their ammes, and weapons, & their warfare, their first passages ouer great Riuers & armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, & then with saile; that they esteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Police: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the same newnelle of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were remoued farre off from the Hebrewes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs,) than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall, as the morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from crueltie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For wee haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages, and houses of clay and Timber, we haue raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; in so much as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and dunnkenesse; from the couering of our bodies with the skinnies of bealls, not onely to silke and gold, but to the very skinnies of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will betake reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, lon- gius, auxit, longissima ubi uet; Long time brought forth, longer time increaseth, and at last, longer than the rest, shall ouerthrow it.

†. II.

The plantation of the Greekes in Sicill.

When the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greece, being driuen vpon that coast by an Easterly wind; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had bene thought fabulous, being deliuered onely by Poets; gave information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, & propoed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Englisb. Wherefore he took the same course that Colum- bis afterwards did. He ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his proiect was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Eubarians.

But the rest of the Greekes were wiser than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubarians, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, called after ward Syracuse: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a wall, which the Athenians

Athenians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Naxos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corin- thians having ouer-come the Siculi, draue them vp into the Countrey; and after a few years, their multitudes increasing, they added vnto the Citie of the Island, that of Akra- dina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commoditie of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertilitie of the soyle; Syrac- use grew vp in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the world. In short time the Greekes did possesse the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Island, making their Royall residence in Trinacia.

Some few yeeres after the arrivall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the success of the Corinthians, did assaile, and obtaine the Citie of Leontium, built and pollitt by the Siculi. In bricfe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that first it, they called Megara.

About 45. yeeres after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Armie into Sicil, and built Gela; whole Citizens, one hundred and eight yeeres after, did erect that magnificent and renowned Citie of Agigentium, gouerned according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the fuentieth yere after their plantation, did let vp the Citie of Akra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yere Casimena, in the Playnes adjoining; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yere of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina; and soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Island. So did the Cumani about the same time, recouer from the Siculi the Citie of Zancle, which they had founde in the streight betweene Sicil and Italie. They of Zancle had bene the founders of Almera.

Not long after this Dorians the Lacedemonian built Heraclea; which the Phanicians, and Carthaginians, learing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soone after inuaded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara; and Zancle was taken by the Messen- ians; who having lost their owne Countie, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Island.

†. III.

Of the government and affaires of Sicil, before Dionysius his Tyrannie.

The most part of the Cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to vsurpe the state of Agigentium, and to exercise all manner of tyrannic therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of brasie, wherein to enclose men, and scorch them to death: pray-sing the deuce with this commendation; That the noise of one tormented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by causing the first triall to be made vpon himselfe. He reigned one and thirty yeeres, saith Eusebius; others giue him but sixteene: How soeuer it were, one Telemachus in the end vpon him with the whole multitude of Agigentium, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, euen whilst the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertie, and enioyed it long, till hero vsurped the government of the Common-weale: at which time also Panastius made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela; but Cleander, hauing ruled 7. yeeres, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers others of the ancient inhabitants, hee forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the Citie of Camerina. But when he had reigned fewen yeeres, he was slaine in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Government, from Popular to Aristocratically, a preparation towards a Principality, wherinto it was soon after changed.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodiens, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greekes, feared themselves in Sicily that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and by advantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that euer gouerned the Syracusians. This change happened in the second yeare of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, wherein he better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also vsurped the state of Agrirentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasibulus: to the first of which he gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principallitie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the fitting, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Atagariens that had moued a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer sort hee brought vnto Syracuse; and the people hee sold for slaves. In like manner dealt hee with other places vpon the like occasion. Nor long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrirentines, hauing dispossessed Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messana, Father-in-law to Terillus; and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicily.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedaemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellefont. He, for their reliefe hauing armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So hee vsed to their Embassadors onely this saying, That their Spring was withered; accomplishing the Armie, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greece Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse receiued, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countrey, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talents of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not onely willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other pretens. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicily in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successeur his brother Thero. Philistus and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasibulus, as hee fought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conuersation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Diuers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrirentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Grecians, against him. Hee also ouerthrew in battaile Thrasydus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrirentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, he lost the loue of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned 11. yeares, he left the kingdom to his brother Thrasibulus, who became a most vniust & bloudy Tyrant. Thrasibulus enioyed his Principallitie no longer then ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, hee was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the gouernment, and was banished the land. From whence he sailed into Greece, where hee died a priuate man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recouered againe their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer fought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principallitie of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preferation ought to answer the acquisition. Where a liberrall, valiant, and aduised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a priuate man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behooueth the Successeur to maintaine it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blows, ere that shee could cleanse herselfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Millitrie of herselfe, and held her selfe free, well-neere threescore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though thus were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Timonias.

Now, to preuent the greatest of any one among them, for the future, they deuised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking pattern from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new deuised iudgement of exile Petalismos, wherein euery one wrote vpon an Olive leafe (as at Athen they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five yeeres. Here by in a short time, it came to passe that choice of iudgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either suppress, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselves. And good reason they had so to doe; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the worse sort vnto the Government; from which, the Nobilitie hauing practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the land (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armie of the Agrirentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde out Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as hee did to flee from the Armie he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they leaue other troops; by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitted himselfe, and is constrained to leaue the land for a time. Yet it was not long, ere he returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead, all the Greece Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse; Trinacria excepted, which also by force of armes, in the fourscore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enioy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, secke aide from the Athenians, about the first yeere of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they preuailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charaxodes. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophacles, Pythodorus, Eurytemon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wanne and lost diuers places; tooke Messana; and, in the seven h yeere of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which did inuade each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the warre, the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians; and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatned themselves in Sicily, by the diuision and ciuill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and saine to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and layd an heavy fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorabell warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicily: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines and Syracusians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had opprest the Egestians; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, & the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre, 10 For, the Athenians vnderooke the protection of their olde friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedamonians dealt plainly, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succor, being in distresse. The Athenians seince knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the conquest of the whole Island. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleuee their owne eyes, which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the Citie of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatness of the enterprise, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedamonians (as hath already bene shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as distured not much from open war. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindered by warres at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians beene overpassionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable businesse, and to reuerse their forces for a more needfull vse. But young counsailes preuailed against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safety than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath bene already made, in that which wee haue written of the Peeloponnesian warre. But what was there deliuered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, other wise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to haue set a great conuersion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commision & direction, as well to succour the Segestans, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians; as also by force of armes, to subiect the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicily, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burden, which transported their victualles, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horsemen.

With these troupes and fleets they arriue at Rhegium, where the Rhegiens refuse to giue them entrie; but sell them victuals for their monie. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres, that these Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegiens, their ancient friends, and allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiseeth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egestans could make; and so returne againe into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would solicite the Cities of Sicily to confederacie against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he perswades them to assaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surprize Catana: and there they take new counsaile, how to proceede. Thence they imployed Nicias to those of Egesta, who receiued from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Island. Thus, the summer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse. But Alcibiades hauing bene accused at home in his absence, was sent for backe by the Athenians, to wake his answer: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neere vnto Syracuse, by this deuice.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusians, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, setting saile from Catana, arriue at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselves against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season. From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messenians. This he now did, in despite of his owne Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedamonians, and to them he gaue mischicuous counsaile against his countrie. While this winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadors to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicily, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peeloponnesian warre) the Athenians in Sicily, saile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Countrey, they obtaine some small victories ouer the straggling Syracusians: and at their returne to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island, from the Segestans, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neere Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments. They also receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the meane while, Gylippus, and Pythias, with the Lacedamonian, and Corinthian forces arriue, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, ioine with them; so that with these and his owne troupes, Gylippus aduencured to march ouer-land towards Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival neere vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to fight in those streights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Armie remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appointe two other Generals, Eurymedon, and Demophilus, to ioine with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he tooke from their Fort, neere vnto Syracuse, at the Promontorie, called Phymnium, wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedaemonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the Warre in Sicily, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyamthes the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The losse betweene them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the necke of this, Demosthenes arrived with three-score and thirteene Gallies, charged with horse-men; and (blaming the fault of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians, the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste then he had good speede, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great losse. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon, determined to retire from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrivall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill speed, caused them to dieret their departure. But this superstition cost them deare. For the Syracusians, Lacedaemonians, and Corinthians, with three-score and fourteen Gallies, comd the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and wherein they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port, encountered them with four-score and fixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon, in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians received the more losse by Land for the night was general: yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians if then any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselves that they exceede all others, they not only lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies suncke and wrackt, had fourteen taken, and possessed by the enemy: and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawne them within a Calisado, in one corner of the Port, vnadvisedly: for it is contrary to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot-men in a plaine field against horse; the one fighting, by being at large; the other, by close-murthering.

The Syracusians, having now weakened the Athenian fleet, resolute to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracusan fleet; which lay but single, because they were faine to range themselves ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laid behinde them againe certain ships, which serued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were suncke, or the chaine, which ioyned them to their fellows, broken, the Athenians might yet finde themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies and Ships, chained together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vessel, vsing oare or sailes, is broken, and their speede fore-slowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were vterly lost except with an invincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolute to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten, of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being dopt by the ships without, & assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians, which were purposely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or suncke. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a sleight, they had no roome to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having over-pestered their Gallies with Soukltiers, who vsed offensive armes of darts and slings, they had not place vpon the decks to stretch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might free themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as remained, were beaten backe to the Land, with losse of three-score of their Gallies, broken, suncke, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also lose twenty of theirs, with Pythion, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottom of the Port, sued themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Soukltiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victory, to sit vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counsaile. For, as wee have heard of many great Capitaines (yea, the greatest number of all that haue bene victorious) that haue neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who, having slept securely in the bosome of good successe, haue bene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue thereby lost againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the aduice of Demosthenes: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolute to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedaemonian and Corinthian Capitaines, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadex, lost both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to perswade his Countreimen to any hasty prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; nor doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleading that the Syracusians had lodged their Armie, which could not long stay there, vpon the passages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily beleueed, and put off his iourne to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wise; and to them, every thistle in the field, appears, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sicke and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the Riuer of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from foraging and prouision of food, they grow weak and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesse the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to passe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall backe againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their iourney intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vanguard, and Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the Riuer Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leauing Demosthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and ouerprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demosthenes being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being viterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riuer Assinarus, rendered himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preferue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemy to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they receiued at Pylos by the Athenians, had saued the liues of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedamon the greatst hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Armie, dissuaded the rest, by all the art he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these braue Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starued in lothsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slauers. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the riuer Assinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourecore and cleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily, the Egeians (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had bene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracusians, and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolved vpon the enterprise; and (by a tricke of their Vnicks wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egeians, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian warre, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a businesse, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Herevpon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imployment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them hauing bene slaine by the Himerians, the other by those of Selinus. Both these Citie, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerians prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slaine, and buried, them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately bene Generall of the Syracusian forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre preuailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein he did great seruice. All the honest sort within Syracuse were sorry for the iniurie done vnto him, and sought to haue him repcaled. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicily, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he began to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to win the the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men, whereby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to rise against the aduerse partie. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict was he slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates aliae againe.

†. IIII.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

The Syracusians had enioyed their liberty about threescore yeares, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their cruelty towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the principalltie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Citie, and of Syracuse it selfe. For, being made Prator, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then began he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of sixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterously affectd to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good seruices. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had bene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefite. His first fauour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to reigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did he helpe them to breake d'owne, as feters imprisoning their liberty, the barres that held it vnder safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but siue and twenty yeeres of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his desire to reigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell, wherein was much good prouision, and vnder it the Gillies were mored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare. The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needy sort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present, were wholly affected to his assistance. Hauing therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what he had already. He strengthened himselfe by diuers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Dorü, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Aristonische, the daughter of Hipparimus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse, which bare vnto him many children, that serued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely gouerned. He had shamefully bene beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all, that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ran-lacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof he poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, no, nor his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnstript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people that euer reigned in any State; and withall the most vnrespectiue-ly cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the rest, like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicill: but while he lay before Herbesse, in Iland Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he againe recovered the matter ouer the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Haruest, he disarmed all the Townes-men remaining: and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Eppoles; which, with threecore thousand labourers, he finished in three weekes, being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with fouretene thousand coskes, and all other suitable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, greatly enfeebled by the plague: That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sicill, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answer, he tooke the spoile of all the Phenician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our Englisb, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourecore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which he held for Carthage yielded vnto him; saving Panormus, Sceffia or Egeffa, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egeffa he lost a great part of his Armie, by a fallie of the Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, he recovered againe Motya vpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messena, he tooke Lipara, and (soone after) Messena, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vtterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tell vs; That one Citie should be able to furnish five hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, wee heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the sixth went to besiege Alger, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of shippes, and threecore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionysius postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco follows him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the hauing receiued aide from the Lacedæmonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens, who in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure: Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill: hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that about an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius told him for a great summe of monie; on condition that he should steale away with his Carthaginians onely: which he balely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spamards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; onely the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliuer vnto memory the like practises, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very futable to this trecherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present, when De Piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered S. Iohn d' Angellie, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. He rendered it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that hee should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Antion his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set vpon, and broken in his March; spoiled of all that he had; and forced to saue his life by flight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid, and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victory, tooke care to re-edifie Messena. Mago, who staid in Sicill, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourecore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but these take egges for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

Hethen past into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegiens on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & fourecore thousand crownes, to furnish him with threecore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future obseruance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more ease. Now to the end hee might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had giuen to them, he pretended to want victuall for his Armie, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him therewith; promising to returne them the like qualitie, at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrell: if they yielded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if hee had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words. Alexander the Great forgave many thirpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errors.

M m m m

And

And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none else, especially in publique.

It is said, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that he vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sauoyan: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, sooner after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe eleuen moneths, till he wonne it by force. He vsed his victory without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and raising of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptines, with foureteeen thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperity and Adversitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore followed his cruelty, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World, and yet they prosper better than the worstest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and as our Sauour Christ hath told vs, The world will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father locked vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; he cast off the Shepess skin, and put on that of the Woollfe. For being iealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius the younger, called Aretas, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Niece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly giuen ouer to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had bene, as he drew him into Sicily, to instruct the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principallitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Histrorian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions severity, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour, and caused him sooner after to be banished out of Sicily, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fittie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, then to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the study of Philosophie; whilst Dion, in the meane time hauing furnished fittie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himselfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other end; than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already bene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceiue it aright. But the seuerall ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberalitie, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoyle they themselves shared no small portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the brauest men that euer Spain brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But he had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to ouerthrow himselfe about him; and to haue it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the reuenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his owne pleasure: nor without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as he did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-fale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby vrged him to take another course, euen to seeke the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sicily. Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in this aduventure. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needefull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicily, marched to Syracuse, entred the Citie without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, saue the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie, but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recover the Towne, hee was faine to depart, leaving yet the Castle to the custody of Apollocrates his eldest son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. Hee was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troupes entred the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoyle, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired, and the Townsmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle sallie againe, with greater furie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour, the loue of his Countrey surmounting all the iniuries that he had receiued. Hee sets upon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Armie, and quencheth the fire euery where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well-nere burnt to ashes and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates, after after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was loone after this his victory, murdered by Gylippus, who, after he had, with ill successe, a while gouerned Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italie, recouers his estate, and returns to Syracuse, driuing Nysaus thence, whom he euer Good neighbour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into consideration with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him alio Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Carthaginians for succour. Icetes alio sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tels them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicily. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more enraged then dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicily. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-matched, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vied to him in priuate; that he might, by publike testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victory, obtained by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to *Timoleon*s desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preface; and hauing set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recouered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was ioyfully receiued by Andromachus the Gouernour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprizing Icetes his Armie, he slue a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adranians ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeelde vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdaineth, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arrival, had recouered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to liue there a private man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse; which are staid in Italie by foule weather. Icetes is strengthened with three score thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Magas (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the wals of that Citie. With this great Armie, Icetes assaulteth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour; in small boats, by night, from Catana. Magas and Icetes doe therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leas, Capaine of the Corinthians, filled one of the Castle, and rooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Magas abandoneth Acra, being being frighted out of Sicily (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as the horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece, many come from Italie, others, from other parts of the Land.

But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybaeum, with three score and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raie, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vctely broken: ten thousand slaine, five thousand taken; with all their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found a thousand corselets, gile, and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an ouerthrow to Icetes, and following his victory, rooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wiues and daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God vpon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arate, Dions wife and a yong child of his, with Aristomache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana to himselfe. Mamercus fled to Hippus Tyrant of Messina; but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the towne, deliuering Hippus to his Citizens, who condemned him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicily.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not pass the Riuer of Tycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island, the inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace; about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie, and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there flatted vp one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of base condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prior; finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principalltie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrary, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so strictly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace betwene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the State of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betwene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prior; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of, the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being diuided into many factions) hee assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites;

diuides the spoile of the rich, among the poore and giues liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controulement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carcases, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the wals, their furie had no further subiect to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sicknelle, by which the common wealth was vterly consumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administred; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratie, by which it had bene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glory and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew, that he had left none him within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord who had bene puttaker with them, in their villinies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as it had bene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of bafe, the other, of Kingly parents; the one, tooke liberty from a Common-weale; the other sought only to recoverts; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after hee hadde obtained the Crowne, sought, by making good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Dionorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that he did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all Sicily into such termes as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But within the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, for their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punicke souldiers, their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punicke souldiers, much taunted by the Romans, as no better than mere filthhood shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Carthaginians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africke, and a new Captain appointed to succede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not haiken to it. All this tended, to haue their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past, since it could not be recalled, they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of seruitie: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so referred, vntill he should returne. This was not to closely handled, but that Amilcar had soone notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusians, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, even against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale subtilly, and finely, they spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremities, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his fore-goyers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what for he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. Hee saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. Hee dissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoile and robbery, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicily his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to haue encountered an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them sharpe entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their businesse vndone, and returne into Africke.

Carthaginians

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilst it was verewhith kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wracke, was bold to passe ouer into Sicily, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed betwene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusians had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby hee lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduersie chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vp held by great circumspection. The war was soone transferred to the wals of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and diuined to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had bene either mercenary Souldiers, enfranchised Slaues, or bafe & needie people; helpers in establishing & preserving Government, and Executioners of the murders, and spoyle, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were to well obserued, and (withall) so carefull, that they durst not stirre. But it was enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; famine was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity, Agathocles aduenced vpon a strange course, which the euent commended as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Harboure; and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had be thought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Harboure, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other prouisions, were drawing neere vnto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise saile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their coming, nor fled backe into the Citie, but made all speed towards Africke, and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had missed of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere, hee thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leisure to doe much mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africke; and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied themselves, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, & beat them; and, hauing sunke, or taken many, draue the rest to sic which way they could, laden with such strange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africke, then did hee discouer vnto them his proiect, & let them vnderstand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not onely from Syracuse, but fro all the Ile of Sicily, than by bringing the war to their owne doores. For hee (said he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foote, which dares to looke vpon their wals. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercenarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue words encouraged his men for well, that they were contented to let fire on all their ships (referring one or two to vfe as Messengers,) to the end that no hope should remaine, save onely in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities, which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground, as a marke of terror to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed, thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicil. This impression disanimates them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had leaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage vnto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomilcar, great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-weale. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it feldome happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessity craue Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who put vnto his victorie winneth many Townes, and lends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to bee lost, whilest hee was traoueling in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces hee thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles backe into Sicil, than to bee drawn home by one, that could scarce retain his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a badde issue. Hee spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusians: and having brought his matters to some good order, hee conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surpris. It was a prettie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and he verily beleued it. He made more haste than good speed, toward the Citie: and coming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that hee had no great chauce to his supper: for they stricke off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hee had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countre into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellus came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous, Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and he so preuailed in Africke, that hee got leysure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a desire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight for their owne freedome, after that they had so long bene expoyled, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countre. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of which hee returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a battaile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe him selfe; his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyle. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both money enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had bene distressed, not onely by this warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Satanne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Idoll, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappie men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neere vnto the Altar, and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is vusual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vpon the Paulion of Agathocles. Heereupon both the Armies fledde away; each of them beleeuing, that the noise in the aduersie Campe, was a signe of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee beganne to assault them, and was so stoutly resisted, that hee lost in this blinde fight, about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore hee tooke the way that came next into his head, which was, to steale closely a-board his shippes, with his younger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flee into Sicil; thinking it the best course to liuit for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son, Archagathus, perceived his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprize; and extremitie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I need not vfe words to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succour which reason offered, the sequels doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraigne enemies, discovered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vied him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyle of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, hee made a frame of brasse, that should serue to scorch mens bodies; and withall giue them leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when hee was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preferre his estate: he threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countrey, took armes against him, and drue him into such feare, that hee was faine to seek the loue at Carthage; which by ruling well hee might haue had in Sicil. Hee freely deliuered liuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phanicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebels, and sealed his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There hee subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yielded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when hee had gotten this great summe, hee would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Heerein (me-thinkes) hee did well enough. For how could hee beleue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible periueries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole body, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his owne, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the olde Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdome, without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Archagathus with feare and sorrow. Hee saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom onely hee now held deare, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he aduised her and them to flie before they were surprisid: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoide, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and made speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether hee threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as hee first beganne it.

After the death of Archagathus it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiterouslie occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Archagathus did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrhus to help them, who had married with a daughter of Archagathus. But Pyrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiouritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our Storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuatiō of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City, Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to bee offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes hee could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the matter. In this good mood, the new Roman Consul, M. Valerius, and C. Clacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusans held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him; and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straying themselves to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And heereupon it is like that they were the more slacke, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to try the vttermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slauerie: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as he might preferue his owne tyrannie: the later, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire then to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publike, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enioyed a long and happy reigne, liuing deare to his own Subiects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their Societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to conspire it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fight in generall.

Hieron, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victualls, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troopes they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum, the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They goe on towards Agrigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part of the Roman Armie range the COUNTRY to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Allians redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betwene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a sallie, nor those of the Countrey without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victualls, and munitions, whilst the Siracusan supplies the assailed with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage: after they had bene in this sort pent vp fise moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesius, a Citie wherein the Romans had belloved all their prouision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse streightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: inso-much, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had bene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directes the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, hee commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beates the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, hee lost the day: and with such as escaped, hee recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiuing this, and remaining hopelesse of succor, resolute to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that hee could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoyled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolute in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africke. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of priuate men, to couet the greatest things, but not to enioy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true life and fruition of what wee haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World vnto this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Townes gaue themselves vnto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping fill the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well, to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselves in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And heerein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fise bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fise on euery banke, and twenty, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea fise many seates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yeere) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Messina with seuenteen Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There hee staid not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the same time Gouverneur in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea mans arriuall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consul vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet hee commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consul; hee grew no lesse foolish hardie then Cornelius had bene. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; fought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuenteen, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Dulius. Dulius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speed of them, deuised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as wee call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vie their hands. The example may be giuen betwene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainly, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must belecue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betwene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clasp ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Strofin, lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, bene lost in the yeere 1588. if hee had not bene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships then he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had hee intangled himselfe with those great and powerful Vessels, hee had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had hee not done, hee had not bene worthy to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands then for the Presse,) I say, That a fleet of twentie shippes, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neere together, in a grosse Squadron, the twentie ships, charging them vpon my angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall backe vpon their owne next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made vnersuiceable or lost. Force them twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirtee that were funke, and threecore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also diuided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that hee ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whilst hee himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had bene at the same time entertained, hee had prevailed: But the second squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed: and Amilcar, being oppressed and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieue both the third and the fourth squadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the first, among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where hee aduise him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes betweene them and the Christians, he should neuer faile to charge the Zanisars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Zanisars who are alwaies referred intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke repositeth his greatest confidence, come vp in a grosse body, when all the troops, on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reformation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and victorious aduantage it hath euer been found, to keepe some one or two good troops to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africk. Attilus the Consull propoundeth intollerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

NOW the Romans according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arriued at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Hieraclea in Sicily, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fiftie English mile from it. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yielded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inuasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arriued at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being aduertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all sorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Consulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consull is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Capraignes, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fiftene thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, that were left with Attilus.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places that were vnwalld, and laid siege to others. But hee performed no great matter, before hee came to Adu. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, hee encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which hee slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driuen to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adu he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Hasdrubal, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicily fise thousand foote, and fise hundred horse to succour his Countrey. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were careful to hold themselves free, from necessitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to to saue the Towne of Adu out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adu, they incampe neere vnto him, and strongly strongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loose the seruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vse of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while, but in fine the Romans preuaile, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceeded to Tunis a Citie within sixteen miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this battaile at Adu, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians; their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Attilus findes his owne aduantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet hee feared lest it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neere expired, should bee quite runne out; whereby the new Consulls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perfwades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But hee propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so courageous and disdainfull, that they resolved, either to defend their libertie, or die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arriued at the same time a great troope of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xanippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neere vnto Adu, gaue it out publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xanippus is sent for; giues the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more then twelue thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wines, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbered, the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonlie found that they which vse the seruice of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xanippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soone bee abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Pelites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a sort of hope; that to these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, driue backe the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing fierlie vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bene accustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subiect vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemy did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xanippus, all in one ranke; before his Armie, which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foote, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was giuen by the Elephants, against which the Pelites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neuerthelesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing at the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driuen those of Attilus out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to turne face euery way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backs; felt Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncouster, entred that Countrey, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, jeusie bien garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire ses Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrary side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which coule the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerse consideration to be had, betwene such a Countrey as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Capitaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countrey, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrey: except euerie Creeke, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted, That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Countrey, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and six thousand at Foulkston, that is (some what equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse I see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to doe it, who are nearer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the fust three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to runne; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to disimbarque his Armie, so that he shall finde it vnlike, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (having liberty to goe which way he list) vndercouert of the night, set saile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Dornes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure: Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may be said of Weymouth, Parbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily outrun the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne violent point en poste; Armees neither flye, nor run post, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be scene at Sunne-fet, and after it, at the Isards; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not be able to march it in fixe dayes. Again, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length sit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeere 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should haue landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euerie where hard of access; having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Naue of fiends; and vpon euerie coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Adamsieur de Chatter, that held it to the vie of Don Antonio, with fixe or fixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse hauing throwed himselfe in the Roade of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chatter, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strasse, laine the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chatter and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves preuented by the more nimble ships of Spainie.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindered, encountered, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equal, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeere 1597. is alleged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name, I may by a ciuill interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it: and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me, to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to invade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease then I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more company to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders should not thinke any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Captaines, and others, not of mine owne Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would haue been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne saile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, volunteers, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Horsey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Cluie, Marshall Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprize I vnderooke. As for the working of the Sea, she steptenesse of the Cliffe, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made fixe or fixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketeers lay on the rest for vs, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauery, and take the shorter course; hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more then a Coward, (which yet was more then we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Paya, than in our taking the shore; that he fought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driuen by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to an halfe trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall, his Maiesties many mouable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maiesty, after God, will employ his good shipson the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

Now the Romans attempt againe to get the maistrie of the Seas. The victory of Cacilius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybaeum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybaeum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses received, vnder Claudius and Tunius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

Then, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they reloued once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So causing fittie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Aulius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xanthippus in Africa, were lesse daunt than they had bene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cacilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybaeum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cacilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approachs somewhat neere the Towne, Cacilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattle a Legion of his Souldiers. To thefe he gaue order that they should aduance themselves, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vterly disordered them. Cacilius, espousing this aduantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted foure yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolute to attempt Lilybaeum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily, and all (indeede) saue Drepanum, that was neere adioyning. They set down before it, and possessed themselves of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, fixe towres of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers, among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achaean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agriumentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and employeth Hannibal to appeale the troups of the Gauls, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vnder taken, are faine to lue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal the sonne of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (theretopersuaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made; and pushed to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybaeum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vnder takes the seruice; and hauing received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Agusa, a little land neere Lilybaeum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quicke of sterage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being compassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vnder take him. This enterprize, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre-off, the aduerture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in peeces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at War; our East land fleet, bound for Leifland, as forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, & he threatened to sinke their ships if they came through the bights of Elfenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduerture, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burreugh, leading the way, did not onely passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with amillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elfenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Farma besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise then by famine, laid his Cannon on the bancke of the Riuer, so well to purpose and so euen with the face of the water, that hee thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but coming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheese, euen the poore

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the service of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Island, against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldom or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an invincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme poverterie, and want of all things needefull, haue bene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath bene untired. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift vnder-takers, haue not bene disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasures, and Paradises, which they enioy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds warre with them five yeeres. The Romans hauing emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of Lucatius the Consull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industry, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybæum, and seek to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemy ships could not bring reliefe. The Consull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had receiued, berought him what enterprises to vnder-take. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, furnished Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did thoroughly repay the spoyle which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicily, and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infect the Romans, he occupied a peece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon: to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not onely very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Ile of Sicily he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer be draine to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vnderooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middle of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Whereto it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Lucretius, Lib. Dec. 3. l. 10 speakes vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had vterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse, Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquired himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of five yeeres warre, the Carthaginian Soldier was iudged equally, if not superiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had bene deuiled and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vnderooke to build each at his owne charges one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, ioyned with some others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, endeavouring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late losses which his Predecessours had receiued; he was carefull to put himselfe in order, against their arrivall.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly tornall, and skilfull in the art of seeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vpheld by a factious contradiction, or things vnder-taken by men more worthy than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great force, confirmed by euery losse receiued. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grieuous oppressors of their subiect Provinces, whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned all to their great losse. He had ere this bene employed against the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Romers, than to Soldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an vnworthy Captaine, hee betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preserve the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserued of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno was very well furnished his Nauie, with all needefull prouisions for the Soldiers at Eryx: (for dexterity in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he

them vnable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would bee contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due; and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disturbed the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to requite them all to some other place where they might bee lesse troublesome. This must bee done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not life to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came backe for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancies to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they remoued, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutiny: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their dailie talk was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to euery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a very formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the poverty of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of money is to bee paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the exorbitant charges, whereat the common wealth had bene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they beare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceiued the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, so that nothing would serue to appeale them.

Hanno would faine haue asswaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee lesse vnderstood their dissant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easie stirred vp to mutinie, nor easie pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can do, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning, some, for want of skill; others of purpose; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sense, are best beleued. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leaue Sicca, and march as fast as Tunis, that is within a very litle of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errout, It is a good rule,

Curandum imprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat Fortibus & miseris.

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not oppressed with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath also bene carelesse in providing to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might follow. Shee had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto she was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue bene disperfed: she hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had she retained in shew of kindnesse, she might haue vsed them as Hostages, for her own safety; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of Waire, she hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be vsed as an instrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the libell promises made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their owne plor, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the souldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer anon some of their Senators into the Campe; who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreame to another, they make the Souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the Citie was driuen; which cannot chuse but adde much insolencie to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wile, and finding the season fit, labors to make a great harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publike seruice of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiuing their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in prouision; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilst the Warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily haue bene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the first. But now they make none end of crauing. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-monic, the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, wherby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of these controuersies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicily, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choise of Gisco: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africke: partly out of a dislike which they had conceiued of Amilcar; for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Gisco comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without money: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calls vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then the feuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; admonishing them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their subiects, was none other than a meretricie tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare, vnlesse himselfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuerthelesse, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of seuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to bee restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee keeke out bounds to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should haue riches in goodly abundance. Hee hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hath enough: but as Couetousnesse is neuer satisfiedly Income. Therefore he deuise new tricks of robbetrie, and is not better pleased with the gaine, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vniustly, he may be laid to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other security, than to disarme all his Subiects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne Countrey: for if not euery one, yet some one or other might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vn honest that can be found: such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose onely fauor they are maintained. Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should be drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauenish, to murder, and to forsake their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englishman perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This isto shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

†. II

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise rise mercinary Souldiers.

Now concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subiects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is ialous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) tearfull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore, to secure herselfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the lesse, to plucke from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessity, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie summes of money: the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed, no wrongs are so grieuous & hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperour to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list; and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Inuena reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slaues; that whilst she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vied all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all sense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extreemely hate her, although desire of liberty make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold her in obedience, all male contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall haue need to vse the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauity, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtians, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, and generall approoued custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphysicall abstraction of the vniuersall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. May therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successeur may prouoe better.

Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthy Kings: and many haue vied their ill gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditary to their posterity, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Government, euen a lawfull Monarchy. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightier Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall vpon the same sore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honey. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Prouince, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares; becomming themselves, within a litle space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these misserfull guests, in hope to winne their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vndergone) and such as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Succesor of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home; a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that haue bene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyrannie are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or of Recovery, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to restrain their Prouinciall Governours; who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bolde in their Prouinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of indgement. If the subiects of Rome groined vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those that were vassalls vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthen some how to increase, or prefer a humane nature: all honours, greatness, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, have vn-made and slain, each of them, more than a million of Men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of Mankind: in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeness, is none other, than Feritie: the lame that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeede all other vices, filling the Passions incident both to Man and Beast; no lesse than Perurie, Murder Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pitias, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Diomsius and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were affixed by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these later Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Freeman, and slaves.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simply, allowable and good. The former of the fcs, is the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor in one other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is greater, and more Maisterlike rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when hee said; Hu maner, and ouer the fshs of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire; and euery liuing thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also he continueth vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The fowle of the aire, and the beast of you, shall be vpon euery beast of the earth, and vpon euery fowle of the earth, and vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fshes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. He who gaue this dominion vnto Man, did giue also an aptitude to vser it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a vnder part of Mankinde. There are indeede no small numbers of men, whose diuinitie gouerne themselves; prouoeth them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturall liues.

But whether this kinde of dominion bee lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well produced, that it is naturall. And certainly wee finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, creature, as in the nature of man : wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the elect and reprobate) the wisest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason : we shall finde that Nature is the ground euen of Masterly power, and of ferule obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries haue subdited long, without the vse of any ferility : as also it is true, that some countries haue not the vse of any tame cattell. Indecde the affections which vphold ciuile rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needefull, vnto the sustentation either of our kinde, as of a Luit, and the like ; or of euery one, as are hunger and thirst ; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and ferule dispositions, haue liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets; there may we more iustly wonder, how the dangerous toyle of sea-faring men can finde enough to vnderake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are weary of their owne more painfull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion : whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subdite together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of flauers.

This being so, we finde no caufes to murraile, how Tyranny hath bene fo rife in all ages, and prafticed, not onely in the fingle rule of fome vicious Prince, but euer by confent of whole Cities and Eftates: fince other vices haue likewife gotten head, and borne a general lawe, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commendable. Few there are that haue vied well the inferior Paftions: how then can we expect, that the moft noble affections fhould not be difordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, fome are vtterly careleffe, and corrupt all by their dull conuiniencie: others, by mafterly rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of flauery. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publike aboue all refpects whatfoeuer, is the Vertue iuftly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages agoe, and not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle as one of them; and deferredly, if this praife be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, vfed in defence of a mans owne country. But if we confider, that a loue of the general good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountain of all goodnes: we fhall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great foener, can, by it felfe, deferue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we muft fearch the Scriptures, for patterns hercof: fuch as Dauid, Iofaphat, and Iofias were. Of Chriftian Kings, if there were many fuch, the world would looke behappily. It is not my purpofe to wring the worth of any, by denying the praife where it is due, or by preferring a leffe excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and zealous in Gods caufe, without enforcement either of aduiforie, or of fome regard of State; a procurer of the general peace and quiet; who not onely vseth his authority, but addes the trauell of his eloquence, in admonifhing his Iudges to doe iuftice; by the vigorous influence of whole Gouernment, ciuilitie is infufed, euen into thofe places, that haue bene the dens of favage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite aboliſhed a flauiſh Brebon Law, by which an whole Nation of his fubiects were held in bondage; and one, who higher vertue and wifedome doth make the praife not onely of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abſtinance from the bloud, the wines, and the goods, of thofe that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto fome good Princes, to appeare leffe regardable: he, I fay, that can finde ſuch a King, finde an example, worthy to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder ſuch a King, it is likely by Gods bleſſing, that a Land ſhall flouriſh, with increaſe of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Ciuitie and Religion ſhall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happineſſe of his ſubiects, ſhall cauſe the Nations farre off removed, to wiſh him their Soueraigne. I neede not adde herunto, that all the actions of ſuch a King, euen his bodily exerciſes, doe partake of vertue; ſince all things tending to the preferation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, ſecketh how to imitate the vnſpeakable goodneſſe, rather than the inacceſſible maieltie, with both of which himſelfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe alſo belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Let any man ſhould thinke me tranſported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reaſon; I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuerthelſe a man, muſt die, and may erre: yet wiſedome and fame ſhall ſet him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a ſingular benefit (though there be many other beſides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodneſſe. The people that liue vnder a pleaſant yoke, are not only louing to their Soueraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muſter of men, then of ſtout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as ouer ſlaues, ſhall be attended in time of neceſſity, by ſlauiſh mindes, neither louing his perſon, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may be furious, and ſlaues outrageous, for a time: but among ſpirits that haue once yielded vnto ſlauey, vniuſally it is found true, that Homer ſaith, God bereaueſt a man of halfe his vertue, that day when hee caſteth him into bondage.

Hem. Od. l. 17

Of theſe things, I might perhaps more ſeaſonably haue ſpoken, in the general diſcourſe of Government: but where ſo liuely an example, of the calamity following a tyrannicall rule, and the uſe of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it ſelfe, as is this preſent buſineſſe of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectfull, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre againſt the Mercenaries was diuerſly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable ſucceſſe. The bloody counſailes of the Mercenaries; and their ſinall deſtruction.

BEing now to returne vnto thoſe Mercenaries, from whom I haue thus farredigreſſed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I ſhould call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they ſecke their wages already due; ſo that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiniers. Had they all bene ſubiect vnto Carthage, then might they iuſtly haue bene termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeauoured to ſubvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and ſtill call them Mercenaries, as Polybius alſo doth.

* Vtica is ſeated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not farre within the Promontorie of Apollis. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Porto Farina, by the African and Arabic ſcholars, Carthage, Carthage, ſaith, that the Towne it ſelfe is ruined, and the place, whereon it ſtood, now called Macassar. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, as ſaith Silius. As it flouriſhed before Carthage was ſet vpon, ſo did it after Carthage was ſet downe by the Romans, in the third Punic Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato, the younger, who held it againſt Cæſar. Vtica, that worthy Diuine, was Biſhop thereof in the time of Seneca, who lived all the time of the Tyrant, and hath written the ſtorie of his cruelties.

Theſe viſing the aduantage of their preſent ſtrength, beſieged * Vtica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being ſeated vpon the weſterne Hauens of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land, Hippagreta ſtanding inwards vpon the great Lake, Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay ſilently to hinder the Carthaginians, from paſſing vp into the countrey: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the buſineſſe it ſelfe awakes them haſtily. They are hardly preſt on all ſides; an ſtethere it auailed their braines to the vttermoſt, how to ſhake off theſe furious dogs from their ſhoulders, who ſometimes by night, ſometimes by day, came vnto the very walls of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accuſtomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together what he ſoouer was needfull, as well to relieue a Towne beſieged, as to batter and aſſaile any place defended againſt him. With theſe prouiſions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vtica, ſo ſuddenly, that the enemies as men ſurprized, forſooke their Trenches, and retired themſelues vnto a riſing peece of woody ground, wherethey might be ſafe againſt the violence of his beaſts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whole cuſtome was, after any loſſe, to ſlie two or three whole dayes iourney off; preſently entered the Towne; to ſhew himſelfe, after this his victory. But theſe good fellowes, againſt whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as neede required. Therefore as ſoone as they perceiued, that he knew not how to vie a victory; they aſſailed their owne Campe, and with great ſlaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themſelues within Vtica; and got poſſeſſion of all the ſtore, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with ſutable indiſcretion: looſing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and ſuffering the enemies to take poſſeſſion of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The

The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their ſtethere anchor; ſending to the field their great Capitaine, Amilcar, whom they furniſhed with ten thouſand foot of ſupply, and ſeuenty Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he ſhould be able to meete with the enemy vpon equall ground. For beſides, other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had ſuffered them to win the only Bridge, by which the Riuer Macra, or Bagradas, was paſſable vnto theſe, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This Riuer had not many fords, nor thoſe eaſie for a ſingle man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept ſuch guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailling in ſeeking way by force. As for the Bridge it ſelfe, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lye commodiouſly, intentue onely to the cuſtody thereof. But Amilcar had obſerued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vied to be ſometimes cloyed with ſand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine cuſtomarie winds, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that ſlow Riuer, till the winds falling, or changing, ſuffered the weight of the waters, to diſburden their channell. Hereof he made vſe; and taking his opportunitie, pulled the Riuer, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come out Vtica: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident granity of Hanno, but with an able ſpirit, euen with their owne Maſter in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this ſcare was ſoone changed into preſumption; when more then ſixteen thouſand of their owne ſociety, were come from Vtica; and other ten thouſand from the gard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they reſolved to charge him on all ſides, and beate him downe, in deſpight of his worth and reputation. With this reſolution they attended vpon him, watching for ſome aduantage, and ſtill exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onſet. Eſpecially they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; wherunto their promptneſſe was ſuch, as tooke from them their former circumſpection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himſelfe on plaine grounds, that were fitteſt for the ſeruice of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made he ſhew of any deſire to fight, but ſuffered the raſhneſſe of his enemies to increaſe, till it ſhould breake into ſome diſorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldneſſe than good heede, they followed him ſo neere, as would be little for their good, if hee ſhould turne vpon them, he haſtened his march, euen to ſuch a pace, as made a ſhew little differing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries preſently fell vpon his ſkirts; beleeuing, that for ſcare of them he was ready to run away. But whileſt they conſuſedly, as in ſudden opinion of victory, were driuing at the heeles of thoſe that had the Rere; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, ſo that amazed with the apprehenſion of unexpected danger, they fled without making any reſiſtance. In this ouerthrow, there were fixe thouſand of the Mercenaries ſlaine, and about two thouſand taken, the reſt fled, ſome to the Campe at Vtica, others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them ſo faſt, that he wan the place eaſily; the enemies being thence alſo fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their ſpirits to make iſgood.

The ſame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in purſuing it, cauſed many Towns reuolted, partly by ſcare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Maibo wanting to himſelfe, in this dangerous time. Hee ſent about Numidia and Africke, for new ſupplies; admoniſhing the people, now or neuer to doe their beſt, for the recovery of their freedome; he perſwaded Spendius, and Antarius that was Capitaine of the Gauls, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwayes to keep the higher grounds, or at leaſt the foot of ſome hill, where they might be ſafe from the Elephants, and he himſelfe continued to preſſe the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard ſiege. It was neceſſary for Amilcar, in paſſing from place to place, as his buſineſſe required, to take ſuch wayes as there were: for all the Countrey lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who ſill coaſted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, ſurrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrey. For Naraulus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend, promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wan from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naraulus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius; wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slaine tenne thousand of Spendius his followes, and foure thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himselfe, with Autarius the Gaul, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were unwilling to become his followes; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanity was vehemently suspected by Mattho, Spendius, and Autarius, as tending to win from them, the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safetie, whilst Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company respectiue onely of their priuate benefit, and carelesse of the generall good, had a purpoe to betray them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; & that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Gesco, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpoe to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiours, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemy Gesco would prove, if he might escape their hands. While he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come, to the same purpoe. Then steps forth Autarius and speaks his minde plainly: saying, thar were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desirous to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with thole that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course euery one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that such as would speake here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the souldiers, and could speake sundry languages, in such sort, that he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheless there were some, that for loue of Gesco, sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewith all contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be serued in like sort: and that the subiects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this cruelty I neede say no more, than that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of vling it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achtophel: All Israel shall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne followes, if they be more innocent; and to auoide the punishment of lesse offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue beene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their severall crimes. A coward thinks all prouision too little for his owne securitie. If Phocas be a coward (said the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be stedfast and sure, in taking reuenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensatiue against new iniuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise wie would haue repented, and fought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Mattho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentleness, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like vnto the errors of Princes and Gouvernours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne security.

Against these inconueniences Mercy and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne souldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to inuade them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance; calling them vnto wilde beasts, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as my seeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, since his last battles. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremity, as threatened vnto ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joyntly consulted. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: neither he could now performe nothing, which was the hatred betwene him and his vntowardly Colleague. The Towns of Tica and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian party, did now reuolue vnto the enemy, murdering all the souldiours that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were left in foule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Mattho and Spendius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) kinde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two noble Cityes, Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioynd two chiefe Commanders in equall commission, vpon this further consideration, the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For heretofore all Common-weales haue beene iequalous, hauing beene taught by their examples that haue made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venetians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in manning the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neere vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres seruice; it is no maruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise then was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one warre, but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Province; vnlesse one businessse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioynd in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their ioynt Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often bene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authority, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and most dangerous overthrowes; whereof in the second Punicke warre we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldome failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper beene better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades: their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hastic, as all came to nought that they vnderooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, hauing sole charge of all, did their Countrie and common-weale most remarkable seruice. For it is hard to finde two great Capitaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of frierie than of iudgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often ouerslipped, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably vnder-taken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Candy was slaine after the Battaille of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chastilian, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hindrance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admirall intended to win by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduertured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we neede no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie, and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; hauing in their Campe aboute fiftie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garisons. Neuerthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault; and the entrance of victualles they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicil hee assisted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principalltie of Syracuse would soone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeede but counterfeite, as the sequelle manifestly proued.

Whilist Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more steightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zorcas an African Capitaine assisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leauing Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naraulus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plainnes. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the streightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus hee continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the overthrow in plaine battaille: vntill at length hee got them into a streight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disadvantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomacke to fight; but awaiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them, to dare impossibilities, vfed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their victuals, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deferred any fauour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindefull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremity, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet saw no appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatened their Capitaines with what they deserved, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zorcas, and Autaritus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they sent to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seemes that theyooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chooseth, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Capitaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage, so terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africke. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naraulus and Hannibal, carried the waire from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeelde: Pitca, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deferred vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigor the siege began; as if speedy victory had bene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his owne destinie, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie hee sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, heooke Hannibal prisoner, on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, hee presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had hee strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where hee incamped.

The terrour was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the same of this losse; than had bene the ioy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Capitaines suruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the employment of one sole General, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastic exigent, to deuise about peeping it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar camp, & by all good perswasions to recõcile them. This could not be effected in one day.

It neerely touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be impured vnto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neuerthelesse after many conferences, the authority of the Senators preuailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred,

In the meane season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to vse the reputation of his late success, whilst it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did; but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: initiating their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing beene often victorious; and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of liberty should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude, as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediately vpon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica onely, and Hippagreta stoop out, as knowing how little they deserved of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and about foure months, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians; whose subiects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Islanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

Mhilest Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their owne vse. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuiued on the fudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all ialousie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue vnderaken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they haue in hand. It is indeede the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such actions, as are equally vnparadonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Marinians murder a Garrison of Africans, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly posselt himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did not onely spare the sickle and spoyle thereof, but gaue them equal freedome with the rest of the Cities vntied. These Reuolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Islanders were no lesse glad, than the fouldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countie: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the fouldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the fouldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, betwene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends, if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vntill the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countie; the matter was not easily takenvp. So they fell to blowes, which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to saue themselves in Italie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with corne: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost siue hundred, and held them in prison, Hercock was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meer regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had beene ouerthrowne by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villains, or haue humbled her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom she had liuely frien for superiority. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunisi, is enough to proue, that Carthage, was not farre from such a miserable choyce. Wherefore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindenesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but sinking shipp, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impouerished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talcins, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alleadge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently fought occasion of warre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paid, how hardly fouer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punic faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposed to make her dearly repeat; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke warre.

His inuious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easily tooke place: and the best means were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the ialousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowne to Rome: wherefore that Province might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decayed forces, with all needefull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and soueraine trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom his Countie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his means, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-wealth; they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable seruises that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the western coasts of Spain; in which Countie, during nine yeeres that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in a battaile that hee fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was inuironed and slaine: crying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, hee had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow ialous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauens, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to cause this owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Countie, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cunning them selves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake hereon) given them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Common-wealth, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuence, than which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and to see their neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprife of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace betwene these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceede any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howsoever the generallitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pillles, to auoideall occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauery of one man might proue more fastidious, and refusing the iniurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole Countie in the quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leysure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent countenance interred into the articles of peace, he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

It had bene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had al been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace, whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceiued by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistreffe ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blows from a stouter Dame; there were soone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, & were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome.

Nevertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discouery or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spain: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countie. Howsoever it were, this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had bene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight yeeres: (being slaine by a slaue, whose matter hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betwene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it, though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole countrie had recovered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Capitaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seized each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatness, as not onely serued to defend themselves, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had bene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betwene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lyfimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie yeeres; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bene already shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father hee had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of hisouldiours, euen at such time, as hauing overthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gauls, hee was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to reueue his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly termed the Iester of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne, which was of much importance, as occupying the better breadth of the Isthmus, that running betwene the Aegean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Townes, that was made betwene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poysoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicæa thercof, and got it from her by a trick. The diuice was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widdow perceiued not how vnfit a match the was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; where the old King was euen as ready, to consent, as was his sonne to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Lady, whose ielousie had bene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauity becoming his old age. But as hee had stolen it; so was it againe stolen from him: neither liued he to recuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succceding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater prooffe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Pardanians, Asiatians, and Achaens, held him continually busied in warre; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip the onely sonne of Demetrius, was a young childe when his father died, and therefore Antigonus, his vnckle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince.

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dofon, that is as much as, Williege, because he was slow in his liberallitie. He repressed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Vpon confidence of this good seruice, he took state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, then onely a Protector. Heereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouernement. The Achaians tooke from him the City of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all, or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuill dissention, which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most, ouerthrew it easily now againe, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authoritie therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

The Achaians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartians) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Law, and to vse one and the same sort of weights, measure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnitd them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bene by the Macedonian Capitaines diuided into many Principallities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subiectd themselves, after the descent of the Heraclide, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes possesst the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whercof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a litle before the Battaille of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a warre, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and tweniethe Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus, Lyfimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimeis, vnitd themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For hauing bene, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Capitaines, and others hauing bene gouerned by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italie. Now after the vnitng of the Patrenses and Dimeis, to whom also the Cities of Tritæa, and Bura, ioyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twenitie and five yeeres, vsed the same forme of Gouernment with the Achaians; who by a Senatorie, or two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Curyneus was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Siryon, who liuing at Argos in exile, whilst his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it receiued more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this coniunction serued well enough against an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaues; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxurie reigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generosities of spirit, that had sometime bene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more then seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands: all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of Lands. All the younger, and poorer fort were glad of this; but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsaillors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindered, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduersie Kings driuen to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and serued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adioyne Lacedaemon to the Achaean Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue bene wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the *Achaean*s, even in their owne kinde: obstructing vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedaemonians and their King, should haue bene the principall; not they and their Prator. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst he was very young, hee gladly embraced all occasions of Warre: for that hee hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Atheneum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities that confederate with the Lacedaemonians; wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights trauell, & discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forrie. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Aetolian practice, & therefore would haue staid the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lyfias & Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the *Achaean*s, (He and Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Caithes, and required his assistance in a iourne to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would moue therefore therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus, who desired to gaine battaile. Yet had the *Achaean*s twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedaemonians, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuertheless the *Achaean*s would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeere following, against Lyfias his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous words of Lyfias. Therefore hee purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neere vnto the Mount Lycæum, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that hee was thought to haue bene slaine. This misadventure Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue bene expected, had hee bene victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could vndertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before ioyned themselves with the *Achaean*s, but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to the Aetolians; and from the Aetolians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus wonne. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaean societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered neere vnto Megalopolis; where the *Achaean*s had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lyfias, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedaemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the *Achaean*s against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the *Achaean*s being wearie, and the Spartan King intente vnto another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painful iournies, forsooke the Achaean warre on a sudden, and came vncexpected home to Sparta, where hee slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue hee an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the Citie; he iustified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. Hee also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in need of Mercenary helpe, as it hitherto had done, to saue it selfe from the Aetolians, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well furnished; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any aduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The *Achaean*s hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantineia; and ready to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, he proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedaemonians resumed their ancient courage, and hee himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalltie of Greece. Hee did not therefore henceforth contend, about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or lose all.

reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineæ, and to those other Townes that he wanne, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemie the Aegyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, velle he might haue Cleomenes his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Aegypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serue. He manumitted all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedæmonian slaues: taking money for their libertie, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion: Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus nere at hand in Aegium. The towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare Armes, rose hostile against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would be of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Acheans at Argum: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore hee returned them backe to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of his vnlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the greued Acheans. When hee had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argines perceiving that their Countrey would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wiser then to be moued with their clamors, and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words, rather than hee would bee ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honor than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troupes; meaning to requite these brauado's of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the ware from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrey of Argos, where he made such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrey of the Argines, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keys. These were light things; yet serued to dishearten the Achaan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting vp his rest, without any more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. Hee had in his Armie eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Boeotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which hee lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus coming vnto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and betwixt the hills of Eua and Olympus, that hee was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which hee greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Armie, in assailing their well defended Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaan foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the straight vallie betwixt those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts, and not onlie disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Capitaine, serued then on horse, as a private young man, among the Acheans. He seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall backe vpon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achaan horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they received a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly then well aduised, entreated some of his own Countymen to follow him; gaue a charge on the Spartans; and forced them, not only to leaue the Illyrians, but seek how to saue themselves. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Illyrian had attempted, like enough to be wonne, through the skilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine; where they might fight vpon euene termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him, by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to haue bene furrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinary speede. In this battaile ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his beloved Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lye in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) & imbarqued himselfe for Aegypt. He was louingly entertained by Ptolemie Euergetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Papalmie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnrindaed of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared, to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because hee was so well acquainted with the weaknesse of Aegypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countymen, hee vnderooke a desperate enterprise: breking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that hee met; and hauing walked vp and downe the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) hee, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead body Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation; and slue his Mother and Children, that had bene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Lepidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie end, as now befall his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the victorie at Selasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: wherein to neuer the force of anie Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer than two or three daies; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an aduertisement that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a little sooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or at least-wise tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedaemon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-straying his voyce; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemie Philopater; beganne to reigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boys all. Of these, Ptolemie, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuentene yeeres of his reigne. The vnrupage of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is visible in the minority of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

W Hilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busied in their conquest of Spain: the Romans had found themselves worke among the Sardinians and Corficans; that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gauls they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Liue saith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea; it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meete to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydionians, his friends, that were besieged by the Atolians; for that they refused to be of their societie. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydionians were so farre spent, that the Atolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoyle to be referred vnto him; for that hee had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to bee chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that olde orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Atolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be ioynly intitled in the victorie, and haue equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Atolians; & though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne business, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne: Many of the Atolians were slain, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoyle, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophy, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Atolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agro King of the Illyrians: not onely in regard regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not vncasie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For ioy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that hee fell into a Plurisie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tenus, his wife.

Tenus gaue her people free liberty, to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference betwene friend and foe; as if they had bene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. She armed a flect, and sent it into Greece: willing her Captaines, to make warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the Citie of Phenice, to take in victualles and other necessities. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gauls; that hauing bene Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Argientum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neuertheless revolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice; which deferred none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and hastned to driue out these vnnelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilaidas, whom Queene Tenus had sent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Towne, and the streights adioyning, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped well in their businesse. For Scerdilaidas found meanes to ioyne with his fellowes, and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of sauing their Countrey, without great and speedily helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Achaens and Ætolians: crauing their helpe, with very pittifull tearmes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home, by letters from Tenus the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his forces to hazzard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their own Countrey by Land, sending their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilest they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Tenus, that she should abstaine from doing such iniuries. These Embassadours found her very iolly; both for the riches which her flect had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue onely the towne Issa, which her forces held straightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good looke to the Romans; that found fault with her doings, and calling them by a true name, Pyracy, requited answers. Yet when their speech was ended, shee vouchsafed to tell them, That iniury in publike shee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadours) wee Romans haue a manner and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authority: therefore, we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had bene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the means, to disquiet and afflict it euermore.

The

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this inuasive is of such nature, as must be required with mortall warre. It is indeede contrary to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally requiied by all Nations, as a lesion taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, and in safetie, betweene enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State, lay hold vpon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell, then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus employed, to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, and subiects, of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedaemonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countie they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoeuer. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it without incurring iustly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Civilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Coruncanius.

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was in deede in an error; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Atolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had the easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuertheless, it preuailed as much, by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she would haue continued to vse her advantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not haue needed to opposit her late gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. Shee sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, and one part of it fell with Dyrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrachium was almost surprisid by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Atolians and Achaens were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryneus, the first Praetor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Corcyra, dismayed with this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrachium. In the meane season, Tenta was angry with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; where he found the Towne of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not onely requiied him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed along the coast, to Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsaile and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land Armie, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselves.

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twenty of their ships; and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rison, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part stiaies behinde, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to beg peace: which she obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of war, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their owne games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were onely rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes; and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italie.

The Gauls that dwelt in Lombardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome, sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may giue credite vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwayes carefull heede to their approach, were it onely bruted. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumults Gallici, tumults of the Gauls: and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vsed to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Having received an ouerthrow; they would rest ten or twelue yeeres, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made onely defensue warre, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was traouailing in the same enterprize; or in either of the two former Punicke warres: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore liket to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had bene bold, to set vpon the Gauls in their own Countie: and that was three yeeres before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretinum, had won a great battaile, and slaine L. Caesilius with the most of his Armie. Mammius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ranfome of prisoners. But these a Dyrachium, sometime called Epidaurum, and now Dyrachium, situated vpon the Adriatick Sea, betwixt the Islands of Pharos & Corcyra, an Island of the Adriatick Sea, not farre from Durazzo, called now Corfu, and in the possession of the Venetians.

c Apollonia, a Citie in Epirus, in Durrachium, vpon the Sea coast. Pyrrhus calls it Epiphanis.

knowes it, as well as the Capitaine, that he which forsakes the field, perceiues, and teares some advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betrayer of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it catcheth thence both courage and understanding. They that make the retreat, are alwayes in feare to be abandoned; and they that lead the way, feare to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retreat, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow, that the French received in Naples, in the yeere 1503, vpon a retreat made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustained the pursuing enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot ouer-tooke, and defeated them vnterly. During the wars between the Imperials, & the French, Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauery would the Imperials, before they left the field. So was Strossi overthrowne, by the Marques de la Roche, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night, as many others, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to giue battaile) have done. Je ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraite; I finde nothing in the art of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retreat. A true rule it is; that there is lesse dishonor to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue giues this iudgement, of a dayes retreat, made in France, presently before the battaile of Moncontour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncontour with so great resolution, as he faued the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turne their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Ambius followes them, as neere as he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his advantage. In the meane while, C. Ambius the other Consul, with the Legions of Sarania, lands at Pisano as the Gauls, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine Ambius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois in the Front; they range the Prenorians, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting vpon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Ambius the Consul: who died in the place, accompanied with two Kings of the Gauls, Concolianus and Anacrosius, with fortie thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were invaded the yeere following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Enlius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their victory: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeeres time, to the Gauls, to repaire their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boji; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to retire. In the second yeere, Furius, and Flaminius, invade the Milanois; and preuaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Cenomani and the Venetians. Neuertheless these Consuls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resigne their Office: because the Aequians, or Southsayers, had found, that some token of other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not onely foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hasty to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrey; then persued the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrey of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Maistie of Rome to be indeede wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the suter side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in proceesse of time, grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Caudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that yeere. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and ioyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consuls hastened into their Prouince, where they besieged Acerra, a towne not farre from Neuaro (so far had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them from this siege, Britomarus sat downe before Clasidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insabrians, to attend vpon the Consuls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and sixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with those at Clasidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their iournie, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauery, lost his game at a cast. Hee had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, & that sufficed to commend him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof onely Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipios, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Caesar, were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered vp to Insipier, Opimas, Polia; The Armour of a Generall slaine by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected to do so.

After this victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpinians, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territories possessed by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, so many as would not subiect their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countreys, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Out-Lawes and Theues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the reign of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the reign of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long: a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer bene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchie as far, as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

§. I.

The warres of Hannibal in Spaine. Quarrells betwene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrian warre proclaimed betwene Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the sonne of Amilcar, was about fixe and twentie yeeres old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. He was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barca) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue beene lesse enuied, by these domestick enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and bene the onely men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy defenses of Amilcar, in saving his Countrey from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great reuenues; so was it retained by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to take the vertue of their enemies, that was vnto proueable; nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautious aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they seasond otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppress the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnto regarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage, were they neuer so quiet, and officious, yntill she would yeeld to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their owne State was in good case, the warre should begin; than that in some vnhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to giue away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, vpon tearmes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Countymen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this business) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soeuer they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would neuertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum, which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignitie of that Spanish Townes alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he neuertheless went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Lince) to giue some colour to his proceedings: as if hee had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum, but had bene drawne thither by couise of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the Oleades; and having besieged Althas (Lince calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master not onely thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrey. This Nation which he first vnderooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand; he rested his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the Paccari; and without any great difficultie, vanquished Salamanca, now called Salamanca; and after it, Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all such of the Paccari, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate by the spoile of their Countrey, with those of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that had escaped in the late ouerthrow, joining themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men; and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tage, which runneth to the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. These foure Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer saw enemy, vpon whom he durst not giue charge, were thoroughly resolved, that his naturall valour would at this time not lesse neglect the cold aduise of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But he that makes himselfe a body of Ciyfall, that all men may looke through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drue him. Wise men, though they haue single hearts in all that is iust and vertuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtil Carthaginian, when he serued vnder Asdrubal, was, of all the men of marke in the Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may become a Captaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwayes become a Cheefe; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as haue bene found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For hee with-drew himselfe from the River-side, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defenses on the contrarie side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well neare ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing; and thrust his Horse-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the River. These carying a kinde of Lance de gay, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middest of the flasse; had such an advantage ouer the foot, that were in the River, vnder their strokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they flew all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberrus (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiuing the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadors to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeede; onely because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Here vpon some cry out, that Warre should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africa. But others went more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they list themselves vpon the report of these Embassadours; and thus their grauitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Liue reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where although y were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of sinceritie lesse questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthage, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liue confesseth) and fall to disputation about the covenants of peace; if they had reiected that which was sent vpon none other pretence, than preuention of warre.

Whilst the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamerites, or people that should doe as the Mamerites in Stil had done for the Romans; and implored his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani; a Nation adioyning to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbors of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoeuer it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more adoe, but sat downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly bene, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reuerence, as of late yeeres they had bene wont. Neuerthelesse, he was glad of any hand some colour, to shadow his actions, not onely because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readinesse to be sent into Spain, whereby they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe ouer streightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an vnthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perils, euen with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had receiued of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece, against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and seized vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, hee might haue speeded better. For the businesse with the Gauls, was ended, with Hannibal not thoroughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consull, Emilius, was sent against him: who in seven dayes vanquished the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terrour vpon the Countie round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeelde themselves, without putting him to further paines. Onely the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which hee might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebelle had not bene too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in court, presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty ships before the Towne, & offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consull, & was soone included from the Town, by chole that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping ready ready for him, and imbarqued himselfe: leauing all his estate vnto them, of whose libellicity he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum, before which Hannibal sat downe, ere Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes vnable to moue. Neuerthelesse he was not vnmindefull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine mouable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall; wher at an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and campe. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so weaue the Townesmen with continuall traile, that at length it got within the wals; and was onely hindered from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-worke of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuer, and without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrein. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold siluer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that hee would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they fare better haue submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enioyed their liues, and saued the honour of their wiues and daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wiues and daughters were desoured before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were about foureteene yeeres of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the deere rate, they shut themselves vp like most wretched creatures in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying vnreueged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers; reseruing some things of choise, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their owne slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadours againe to Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embassage, howsoeuer qualified with milde words, was indeede more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guiltie, or not guiltie. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue onely followed his owne counsaile, or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull or unlawfull, for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors, to you, to challenge vs, if we haue done anything contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lucilius the Consull, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were nor then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treatie between vs and Lucius, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandment and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lucius the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to haue dealt plainly; and to haue alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts; it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which periurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines, it little skiled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith intred their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Asdrubal, and all other businesse betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman iniuries, as implying this commination, Do what we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which we haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Linus himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought conuenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long bene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Scipio gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-skirt both Peace & Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once, Euen which of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Scipio) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely fruituolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer beene maintained by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwayes pleade performance of covenants. There haue beene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (seeing peace betweene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) he best aduised haue rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragons, with the French in Naples; Henri the second of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brisac, to surpris as many places as he could, ere the war brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbargo he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of iniuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time hee did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he

he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no maruell, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africke. His journey into Italy.

WHEN hee being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put vp his sword, which he had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill he had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage, where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troopes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africke thirteene thousand, eight hundred and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine, which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirteene were presentlie armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations strangers, he left with him about twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africke; he sent Discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyreanean Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and discoverers being returned with good satisfaction, in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued; and appointed Hanno (not that olde enemy of his house, who late still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, hee courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the iourne seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, hee past the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaul. Hee found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwell, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore fought to keepe him from passing over the water. But hee was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vinaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrey of Daulphine, phine, thinking to defend the further bankes against him : yet such as remained, being very desirous to free their Countrey of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countrey-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer : and lent him guides. When the Vetsels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; hee sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer : himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was : that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further bankes was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruellously feared the water. He was therefore driuen to make rafses of trees, and couer them with earth and Turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each bankes, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpinas, that inhabited Picmont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these hee received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himselfe extremely incombrd by the Sarvians; and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly hee would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainelie assailed by them, before hee could recover the plaine Countreys on the other side. And whereas this iourne ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trouble, hee was euery day, more or lesse, not onely charged by those Mountainers, but withall extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow : it being the beginning of Winter, when hee began, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plainnes, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort and encouragement to go on : haueing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Romane Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vaine solicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THE Countreys of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they receiued by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer : With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade vs to value your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue bene utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as wee, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countreymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands; who are resolu'd, neuer to make account of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gaules; vsing their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territorie : and withall greatly glorifying themselves, thems, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laugh't them to scorn, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall wee (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italie, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made against vs? Shall wee hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deferred to well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

* With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadors returned home : carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Masilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gaue hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boij, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Romane Colonies, at Cremont, and Placentia, within their Territorie. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrey) to flie to Atodens; where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, hauing little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed wearie, & seemed desirous to haue peace; and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting, that they might therein hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prator, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a strong ambush in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Prator so opportunely, as he was utterly overthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prators, was hastily sent, to relieue the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Romane associates : which forces were taken out of the Consuls Armie, and supplied by a new levie.

As the Gaules were too rash and lustie; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-aduised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost feruently endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would bee so braue and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Affrike; resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Affrike, with an hundred and 60. Quinqueremes, or Gallies, of five to an Oare, which preparation may seeme to threaten euery the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come neere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Goma, into Prouence, and vied such diligence, hauing the winde also fauourable, as in five dayes he recovered Masilia. There he was aduertised, of Hannibal his hauing passed the Riuer of Rhodanus, whom he thought to haue found busie yet a while in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arrivall : whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry, as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings : Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten : yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing slaine onely two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neere, to haue met with the Carthaginians; hee found, that they were gone three daies before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Neuerthelesse hee went away thither his brother Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to trie what might be done against Asdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa, and so passing through Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troups of Manlius & Attilius, that lately had bin beaten by the Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourne.

Scipio the Romane Consul ouer-come by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Consuls, beaten by Hannibal, in a great battaile at Trebia.

TWELVE moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourne from Carthagens; what great muster he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, & his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to haue bene onely twenty thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacina, agreeeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that ioyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rho-danus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which all save those remembered by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diuicates, enemies, Rivers, and Mountaines; which mischiefs had deuoured, each, their severall shares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and leaue refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countie of Piemont; he sought to winne the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insulbrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their spoile serued well to hearken his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arrival, made some to be more aduised, then the rest. The name of the Romanes was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians; experience had the not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had bene heard of his approach: many faine fled for very feare, who else would faine haue concluded a League with this new come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians, whom neuerthelesse they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hasten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of the wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange, that the Consul whom hee had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange aduerture of passing those Mountaines, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's success; and sudden arrival. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sempronius the other Consul, that was then in Scitia, giuing him to vnderstand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas hee had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should returne to the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speed; to saue Italia it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybeum; with direction to land the Armie at Ariminum, a Port Towne not farre from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neere, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Heereupon, both of them prepared the mindes of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a present example, that hee shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Savoyens, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italia. For these, hauing bene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to bee deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to receiue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gauls were wont to vse in single combats. Every one of these unhappy men withed, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Spektators, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were reuined. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetuall slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Rivers, the great distance from their owne Countie, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginings. Hee therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing that there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer bene broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, hee told them, that the Romanes, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane betwene victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Capitaine of France) la commodité de la retraite aduance la fuite: The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a flight running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that hee had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the River of Ticinum, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors, against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet hee praied them withall to consider, that at this time it was not onely to diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Armie likelie to encounter the Romans, but so weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (saith he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so manie trauailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driuen backe to the verie Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, people, both in Africa, and in Sicily. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being farre aduanced before the grolle of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman hauing alio with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other, Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gauls, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betwene their troopes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shrinkt at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they receiued; as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deterring him his aide; and the haste flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he aduentured himselfe so farre, that he receiued a dangerous wound; and had bene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward furnamed Africagenerous wound; and had bene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward furnamed Africagenerous) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilst the Romans were busied in helping their Consull; an unexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compasse them about, whilst hee with his men at Armes sustained them in charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and iowred: so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisdome, hauing lost to many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extreamest of the tempest ouertooke him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stole the retreat, and recovered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Heerein hee followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, tutissimos miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a General of an Armie, by some vnpropitious beginnings doubt the successe; or find his Army fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retreat, than to abide the vncertaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilst refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, now issued forth of their Campe, to forsake him. They thought that now the long desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Amerestus, Brivmarus, and Gessates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman Campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal receiued them, exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following; the Consull stole a retreat, as hee had done before, but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, save some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and save themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to trauaile by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consull; incampes himselfe strongly vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For euery day, more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Boys, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens & pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clasidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundisian whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse receiued; seeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his coming. Hee therefore halted his her; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal's arriual; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all means to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victory, which hee had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. Hee also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-nere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; obiecting the vnskillfulness of the new-come Souldiers: and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonor which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; hee no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls inhabiting nere vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might haue done; although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to let them at libertie, hee had vnderaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, hee was bold to be his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Heereupon they fled to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: hee suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to persueue their Confederates from suffering iniurie: and that thereby might be wonne the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore hee sent out a thousand horse: which coming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his foragers, and finding them heauy laden, cut many of them in peeces, and chased the rest euen into their own campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster then they came. Sempronius was readie to backe his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consull would haue it called) made the Romans in generall desirous desirous to try the maine chance in open field : all the persuasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Romane Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces : He found in the hollow of a water-courfe, ouer-grown with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, hee had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse : to braue the enemye, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitie to fight : and therefore not onely issued out of his Campe, but foorded the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day ; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes : which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Laines : hauing of the one, sixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse : thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies ; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants ; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush : then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies swords ; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of sixe and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserved to be recompensed with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferior in horse, and withall thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-euen grounds and wood-lands, would haue been of no vñe. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought ; whereby he was grossly ouer-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his footmen with emptie stomackes, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemy fresh and fed ; since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generosities of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got there-with into Placentia ; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres ; or would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreame danger, flying through the Countie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight ; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neuertheless hee got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following : and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain ; & his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

IN the Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for seruice : to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Ceremonia. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet : but vexed them with continuall Alarmes ; assailing diuers places ; and taking some ; beating the Gauls their adherents ; and winning the Egyptians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Romane Quæstors of Treasurers, Treasurers, two Colonels and fūe Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde : those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countie without ransome ; with this pro- teltation, That hee therefore vnderooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countie the seat of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason would them, at his feeding vpon them, and walking their Territories. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life ; others admonished him of the danger : and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him ; but were in like sort detected. Hee was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that hee might not bee desired, nor knowne, to those that should vnder take to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring ; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had scene more Swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre neerer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls, more seruicable friends, abroad, than in their owne Countie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romane Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way : the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was tra- uailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourne. Neuertheless to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue beene erected vpon the ordinarie pass- ages towards Rome : he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Penes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, hee lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes ; by the moist- nesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe myre and water. In briefe, after he had with much adoe recovered the firm and fertile Plaines, he lodged about Arretium : where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard news of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilus had of late been chosen Consuls for this yeere. Seruilus, a tractable man, & wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate ; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator ; who hauing once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse hee quickly finished the warre. This iealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome ; when hee entred into his Office, left his aduersaries, by sayning some religious impediment, should detain him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore hee departed secretly out of the Towne ; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arimi- num. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors : but he neglected their iniunction ; and hasting to meet with the Car- thaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierce disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victo- rie. There fore hee prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman ; hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilus came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countie betwene Fesule and Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose ; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had bene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath said, Plus çaite m'esté pas perdu ; A wasted Countie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to bee much impaired ; and there- fore advanced towards the Enemye. Many aduised him (which had indeed bene best) to haue patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare : saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burn- ing downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore hee tooke horse ; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tullie makes a least: saying, that the cowardlie knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their ieaousie both hee, and the Senate that did giue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene; was on a light fire, which whilest the Consull thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal to vnadvisedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all sides, (save onely where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flee from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slaine in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carcases of his Countymen. About sixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way recovered the toppes of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair, of saving their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweate, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not any way discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable laughter of their fellows. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to bee gone, ere they were decifered, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For decifered they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering vp their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first baigne; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanish Conquests; according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as a Romane, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousefne gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fiftene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romanes, hee set free without ranfome; protesting, as hee had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had undertaken this warre. But the Romanes he kept in straight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but onely the preferring of her owne necke from the yoke of flauerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two batailles. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Seruilus the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, hee increased onely the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them, and killing almost halfe of them, deate the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yielded to mercie, the next day. Seruilus himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gauls, against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular ieaousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the warres; which greatly endangering, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are fire better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtile Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to bee caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also be like forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to bee preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honor of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrary to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arrivall of Seruilus. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly auow it, that by being continued in his government of France 10. yeeres, Cæsar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the German, vnder the Romane yoke; into which parts had there beene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began by to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Government, fitting the Countie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Governments, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the olde examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likeness of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lining in Warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting, adventures rashly vpon Hannibal; and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

REcently were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than euer did war, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers, and so little accustomed to receive an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe; and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee onely sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie; demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which hee burned with desire of reuenge. Tichnum, Trobia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, &c. his abilities. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bin out of vise, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto the comprell of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Confull being dead, and the other too farre off, the People tooke vpon them, as hauing supreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie. Novum factum, novum consilium expetit, Con- trarie winds, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the Horse: which Officer was customary, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion:
a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleue, that those bookes of Sybil, Master of the Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, & amplified; as hauing nor bin rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And firstly this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempred with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serve to beare witness; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walles and towners of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuer were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult; when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthagi- nians, Fabius commanded Seruilium the Confull to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended vpon Han- nibal. Foure Legions he had leuiued in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Armie, which Seruilium the Confull had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal, not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and vsed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom hee did put to the sword, all that were able to bear armes. Passing by Spoleum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Having refreshed his Army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing them pasterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Nor-therne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Murrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ran, he had not taken any one Ci-tie: only he had assailed Spoleum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the bat-taille of Moncouster; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St. Iuan d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. Hee would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detain him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care wasto weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walked Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end hee presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers bred vp, euer since they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and aduen-turous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no former seen the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore heatten-ded the Carthaginians to nere, as hee kept him from straggling too farre; and preferred the countrey from vnter spoyle. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon farre off, that in the end they might sit on his taile.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fa- bium with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-aduised Commander. For wile men are no more moued with such noise, than with wilde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indifferetion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It waileth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the inuading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the inuading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall vpon the most rich and pleasaunt Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horse, he alwaies kept the Hills & fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Di-tator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Townes stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though a farre off; he reloued to rest his Armie, that was laden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators Campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callicula, and Castinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrey, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by mere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Castinum, whence he might both assaye the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from coming nere it to prevent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awy another way, from Castinum to Castilum, whence Fabius hoped that hee should not easily cleape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory, without blows. But Hannibal refused this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the Countrey, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose horses he dressed with dry faggors, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fa- bius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumvent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recovered sure ground, without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish:
After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iourne towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, betwene him and the Citie, whilst the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke to Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spa- niards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent.
All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by iudge-ment of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius.
In this iollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily for-bidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreame perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held vndoubtedly his owne; and the loue of the Armie, and the friends that hee had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to sue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer so hal-luciously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore he drew nere; & to prouoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius

incamped hard by him : but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps, which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wane from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer : if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increafe his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countreie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This aduantage Minutius wisely e'pied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers : who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meerly weakenesse, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless he did not such hurt, as hee had received.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euerie man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship : saying that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that hee would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise, and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator : speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euerie one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people : which Office warranted him to speak, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said hee) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consull all this while; Servilius is sent away on Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds : (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoyle some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspicion) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this : He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sold Gouvernement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie, thus farre forth I will regard his honour : I will onely onely propound, That the Master of the House may be ioynd in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so inturious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp; and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace; both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignity, whose great power, had freed the State at seuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeeere before had bene Prator, was glad of such an opportunitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very balennesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard push at the Consullship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would: So he made an hot inuectiue, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them; in matter of Government; That they sought to humble the Commons by poueritie, and to impoverish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euerie poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise : and since they had found one; (his worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countreie, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authority, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius : and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiuing well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius : so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what fort he thought it best to diuide their authority : whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiually, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour : Hee would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and a halfe from the Dictator. Needefull it was (though Linie seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two feuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioynd in Commission, but haue each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies : in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiually (as the two Consuls vied) with Minutius, by turns. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractary, and so proud of his aduancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator : who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subiection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authoritie, loue nothing more, than to contest with it : as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius, of auoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countre lying betwene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; hee made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduention vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troups with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neerer, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the disgrace which hee had wrongfully sustained, fought rather to approue himselfe by lasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feede thereward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a shower, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue bene saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long; and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilus the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed ouer into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrey, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being forewarned by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consull, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces leuied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were given to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeede preferred them from receiving a great overthrow: but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in appurance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome: since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne private losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Comminallie were then in such a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereinto helpe, he had a kinsman, Bibulus Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vie the liberty of his place; in saying what hee listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeede with his two Legions, was likely to haue bene ouerthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all bene ioyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consull, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since bene aduanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meener sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consull, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a more new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could with more, than to keepe it, by well deseruing of them. By such persuasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successively, by the space of five dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Vigiles, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls, and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to slip five dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well alluaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publikey declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no deuice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was belueed) of this meane, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, onely Terentius was chosen Consull: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be ioyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few yeeres since had ouercome the Thyrians; and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Livius that had bene his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto iudgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying in the most grievous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happy victory that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, traualled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilus and Attilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuerthelesse, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, & weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to relute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them somewhat euely ballanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Othacilius the Pretor, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe ouer into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus another of the Pretors, went against the Gauls, to reclaime that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing bene their subiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not knowne: onely this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driuen soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any caule about forfeiture for nonpayment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as possibly as they could, without incurring the necessity of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not onely blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the misery following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not onely furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnlesse they would be troubled with farre carriages. Besides this, and more to his aduantage, hee enabled himselfe to abide in that open Country, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many mounthes to feede, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Seruilus had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command no small part of the Countrey adiacent; it then seemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduantage a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuerthelesse, answer was returned vnto Seruilus, that he should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as neede required.

When all things were ready in the Citie, and the season of the yeere commodious to take the field; the two Consuls, with their armie, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemne Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Amilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honor, or likely to doe his countrey remarkable seruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatnesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consull Paulus, with many graue words, to shew his magnanimity, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which hee thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follic of his fellow-Consull. The answer of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, hee would thinke it lesse ruinesse to aduantage vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diffention betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

THESE new Generals, arriving at the Campe, dismissed M. Attilius one of the last yeeres Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenesse: Seruilus they retained with them, as their Assistent. The first thing that Amilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words: who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the state and safety thereof rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectfull part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambush he had solue the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Hee willed all he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thicke mist, through the darknesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what aduantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Amilius was knowne to be, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwayes thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, hauing preconceived a victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembered what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Amilius had acknowledged, that the aduantage was theirs, why did he make them forbeare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Confull Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had beene in the Citie. Expectation is alway tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastned their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Amilius would fo too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Elminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Amilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaincs; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude wel-come and intertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vantcoursers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Felites, some troupes weighily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Amilius, who could not handiomey withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus, lending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. He neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground forced wholly for the aduantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal teames. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessities: whereof an Armie foraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Liuius differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had beene driuen; and of base courtes that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Liuius) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vntruly Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaulle with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destines. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he resolved to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilst he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaigne ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Liuius, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam (dicitur) agitasse; Hannibal (û said) u huc

haue bene thought himselfe of flying into Gaulle: where he makes it no more then a matter of heere-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaulle, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victualles enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this year; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great haruest; since he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surpris, no small part of the Romans provisions? Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattail; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had so well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrey, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and laden his followers with spoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Armie free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men focuser fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnely protested & sworn, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaulle, was a fencelesse deuice, Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse: or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue, hauing betrayed all his Army; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteyth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Liuius. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne Countreimen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he began to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needlesse hazard. Against whole words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could allege none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians, ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Amilius perceived, that hee could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Tenne thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity hee was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise, somewhat higher up the streame, which ran from the South; leaving in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said hee) pray for any greater fortie, than to ioyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horle aduantage to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may euencourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye haue as often beaten as scene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to driue them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Countrey, and fields of Italie; both of which ye haue obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers; and ere many houres passe, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this: his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what work they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Atago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a iest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had bene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the first: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant iests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vnder takings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which he had long before conceiued the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Bileares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdus; but when we vse our owne termes, the solonne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, he ordered this. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly serued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betwene these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Country manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules vsing long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell upwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse; the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew, and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge, but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence ioyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaul, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to employ the vttermost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great aduantage, which the Carthaginian had in horle: by which he was able, if the world had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so liuely, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to aduance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should be ouerhardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vanguard: the two poins of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thin, as seruing onely to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thickened against all impression. The circle hercof seemeth to haue bene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brass, as I haue scene of this Battaille, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were posted in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betwene the last ranks of his long battalions, and in the head of his Reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betwene the left battalion and the River Ausidus, were the Gaules and Spaniards, vnder the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Lisie saith Masbarbal) with the Numidian light-horle. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole sum of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horle, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and Hee, fve to three against them in horle.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long, as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might rally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battalies accordingly, as meeting to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horle, against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Emilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horle-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horle, which were of the Latin, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians hating their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betwene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and slingers

slingers of the Gauls: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of seruice on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron; as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not onely vsed their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they began to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouerborne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gauls and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horfemanship. When the battailes came to ioyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more then enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spanish foote make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and folly pursued. Vpon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall soule; both for that there was void room enough; and forasmuch as the Rere, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retreat, or flight, of the Gauls and Spaniards, it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or viter compass of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, onely turning round, and recoyling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vniuitingly engaged themselves deeply with in the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced to farre, that getting beyond the Rere of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Herby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would haue beene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Arme, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them, along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless he cheered vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better success. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. Here vpon all his company company alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battails, the Roman men at armes had left their hories, to helpe their foot in distres. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceiued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was maruellously troubled by Hannibal (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, drate into the eyes and mouthes of the Romanes. These, vsing their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen ready to ioyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendered themselves. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where hee bad them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduenturers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Vnder their lackets they had short swords and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romanes, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischiefe, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backe of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in pieces all, saue the Companie of Emilius that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recouered some narrow passage, between the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell backe behinde the Rere of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom he ioyned, and gaue vpon Terentius.

This fearefull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine, thought it the best way, to auoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wise than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in struing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue endured with their assistance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome, and another, to incounter him. But of this; or of ought else, excepting hastie flight, his present leisure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for that seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backs of the Romanes; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. Hee brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne. Heere began a pitifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, as they knew not whither or which way, whilest euery one sought to auoid those enemies, whom he saw neere. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got vp to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe, yet I will rather beleue it, than suppose that Emilius so reporteth, to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. Cm. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where hee saw the Consul sitting all blouded vpon a stone; entreated him to rise and save himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it, willing Lentulus to save himselfe, and not to lose time: saying, There it was not his purpose to bee brought into iudgement by the People: either on an accusation of his Colleague, or as guilty himselfe selfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: writing them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling Fabius, that hee lined and died mindefull of his wholesome counsaile. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul & his troupe, in little better case than if they had bene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottoome; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffed together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilest the battaille yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he neuer so well bin mounted) vnable to flie, hauing in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodics, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaille he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly lost, it had laine in his power to saue his own life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much esteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot, Viscount Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsburie, who died in the Battaille of Chalillon, more highly to be honoured. For Amilius was old, grieuously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the ouerthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when hee refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaille, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leaue him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who (as Liue saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and ioyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troupes, partly dispersed, into Cannusum: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeilded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-neere done, the battaille was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeilded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a greater number of these did flie, and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enimie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Romane horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuer; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That hee was so ill attended, it is no maruell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neere way thither, had bene through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had bene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned vp some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted comre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them; and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaille of Cannæ, besides Lucius Aemilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Questors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, foure score Senators, or such as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall make, as hauing beene Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was *Cn.

Servilius* the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius late master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaille, Linie makes no greater than three thousand foote; and three hundred horse: not few to haue defended for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Linie saith, to haue beene ouer-cowardly yielded to. We may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no lesse then eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about fiftethousand more, who yielded in the greater campe, when their com-panie were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romanes, especially the consull Karta, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gauls, fiftene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the ioy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently bene at an end. But hee beleeued not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therfold told, That hee knew how to get, not how to lose, a victorie.

Of things following the battaille at Cannæ.
